

2 in 1
GREAT VALUE

DADDY BY CHRISTMAS

PATRICIA THAYER

CHRISTMAS
MAGIC ON THE MOUNTAIN

MELISSA McCLONE

Cherish

Melissa McClone

Patricia Thayer

Daddy by Christmas / Christmas
Magic on the Mountain: Daddy
by Christmas / Christmas
Magic on the Mountain

Аннотация

DADDY BY CHRISTMAS Jarrett McKane has never had any festive cheer, but when pregnant Mia needs help he won't turn his back on her. Before Mia, Christmases were spent alone. Now this previously ruthless tycoon may just have found a fairytale ending for all his Christmases to come! CHRISTMAS MAGIC ON THE MOUNTAIN When Sean Hughes meets Zoe Flynn on Mount Hood he recognises a free spirit – much like himself! And as they spend the Christmas holidays together Sean soon wishes there was more than just chemistry between them. But Zoe has a secret...and he has until the clock strikes midnight on New Year's Eve to discover it! These two heartwarming tales capture the magic – and the romance – of Christmas!

Содержание

Daddy by Christmas	5
Patricia Thayer	6
Christmas Magic on the Mountain	7
Melissa McClone	8
Daddy by Christmas	9
Chapter One	12
Chapter Two	23
Chapter Three	41
Chapter Four	56
Chapter Five	70
Chapter Six	85
Chapter Seven	99
Конец ознакомительного фрагмента.	112

Daddy by Christmas

By

Patricia Thayer

AND

Christmas Magic on the Mountain

By

Melissa McClone

www.millsandboon.co.uk

Daddy by Christmas

by

Patricia Thayer

Dear Reader,

So many of you have asked if I plan to give Jarrett McKane his own story. Well, I've finally returned to Winchester Ridge, Colorado, and decided the brooding, live-on-the-edge guy needs a little redemption.

It all starts when he runs into pregnant Mia Saunders and the tenants from Mountain View Apartments. There's widow Nola Madison, handyman and World War II vet Ralph Parkinson, and Joe Carson and other retirees like Emma and Charlie Lowery.

When Jarrett is court-ordered to move into his shambles of an apartment building, he finds himself going beyond landlord duties. He's talked into hanging Christmas lights, making runs to the hospital, painting a baby's nursery and standing in as a labour coach. Oh, yes, Jarrett McKane definitely meets his match.

In creating the characters of Nola, Emma, Ralph and Joe, it made me think back to my own grandparents, John and Lydgia Greiner, and Paul and Loretta Hannan. Their love was unconditional, and time with them was special. I hope this story brings back good memories for you, too.

Enjoy!

Patricia Thayer

Originally born and raised in Muncie, Indiana, Patricia Thayer is the second of eight children. She attended Ball State University, and soon afterwards headed West. Over the years she's made frequent visits back to the Midwest, trying to keep up with her growing family.

Patricia has called Orange County, California, home for many years. She not only enjoys the warm climate, but also the company and support of other published authors in the local writers' organisation. For the past eighteen years she has had the unwavering support and encouragement of her critique group. It's a sisterhood like no other.

When not working on a story, you might find her travelling the United States and Europe, taking in the scenery and doing story research while thoroughly enjoying herself, accompanied by Steve, her husband for over thirty-five years. Together they have three grown sons and four grandsons. As she calls them, her own true-life heroes. On rare days off from writing, you might catch her at Disneyland, spoiling those grandkids rotten! She also volunteers for the Grandparent Autism Network.

Patricia has written for over twenty years and has authored over thirty-six books for Mills & Boon®. She has been nominated for both the National Readers' Choice Award and the prestigious RITA®. Her book Nothing Short of a Miracle won a Romantic Times Reviewer's Choice award.

A long-time member of Romance Writers of America, she has served as President and held many other board positions for her local chapter in Orange County. She's a firm believer in giving back.

Check her website at www.patriciathayer.com for upcoming books.

To my own little heroes, Harrison, Griffin, Connor and Finley.
You're the light of life.

Chapter One

SHE hated relying on a man.

Mia Saunders glanced around the filled-to-capacity community room at the Mountain View Apartments complex. It was already decorated for Thanksgiving and the tenants were hopeful that they would still be living here at the end of November.

At one of the many card tables were Emma and Charlie Lowery. They'd lived here for over twenty years. So had the Nordbergs, along with Second World War veteran and widower, Ralph Parkinson. They'd all come here for the same reason—affordable rent gave seniors on fixed incomes some independence.

At the age of twenty-nine, Mia was an exception, one of the few, younger tenants who lived in the aging apartment complex.

“You’ve got to help us, Mia!”

She turned to tiny, gray-haired Nola Madison standing beside her. She was a widow who had lived in the complex since her husband’s death ten years ago. With social security and a small pension, Nola could survive living alone here without burdening her children.

“Nola, I’m going to try, but I’m not sure how much I can do.”

“You’re a lawyer,” Nola said, her soft hazel eyes seeming larger behind her bifocals.

“Not yet. I’ve only just started law school.” That had been put on hold this past semester and she had no idea when she could start up again.

“But you will talk to the owner for us when he gets here.”

“If he gets here,” Mia added. So far that hadn’t happened. They’d tried a half-dozen times to have a meeting with the man to discuss the fifty-year-old apartment complex’s crumbling condition. No improvements had been done in years.

“It seems the new owner has been avoiding us.”

“Well, he has good reason. He doesn’t want to fix things any more than the last owner.” Joe Carson, another of the elderly tenants, spoke up behind her. That got the crowd going.

Mia waved her hand and they quieted down. “This isn’t getting us anywhere. In all fairness...” She glanced down at the paper. “Mr. Jarrett McKane only took possession of this property a few months ago.”

“McKane,” Nola repeated. “I wonder if he’s any relation to the teacher at the high school, Kira McKane. My granddaughter, Hannah, talks about her all the time.”

Joe stepped forward. “I don’t care who he’s related to, he has to take care of our demands.”

Joe’s wife, Sylvia, gasped. “What if he evicts us?”

That started more grumbles around the crowded room.

Mia eyed the tenants she’d gotten to know since coming to Winchester Ridge when her brother, Reverend Bradley Saunders, took over as pastor of the First Community Church a half mile away. She'd found a one-bedroom apartment in the affordable complex about three years ago when Brad and his wife, Karen, decided to make the small Colorado ranching community a permanent home. It was a perfect place for raising a family.

All Mia's life, it had been her brother who'd been there for her. Brad had never given up on his little sister, even when she gave up on herself. Over the years, he'd pulled her back from some pretty dark places, and let her know that she was important and loved. When their parents disowned her, Brad stood by her and helped her get her act together and get into college.

She'd do anything for him. Sadness washed over Mia, knowing she would never get the chance again.

Sam Parker hurried into the room and called out, "One of those fancy SUVs just pulled up. A shiny black one."

Those standing scurried to find a seat as if they'd been caught doing something wrong. Mia didn't rush much these days, but she felt the excitement and nervousness as she took a chair at the head table, and then turned her attention toward the door.

Nothing had prepared her for this man.

Jarrett McKane walked into the room as if he owned it. That was because he did. He was well over six feet, and his sheepskin jacket made him look ever bigger as his broad shoulders nearly filled the doorway. There was a brooding look in his ebony eyes that made him look intimidating.

It didn't work on her.

She was Preston Saunders's daughter. No one could intimidate like the CEO of a Fortune 500 company. Though there was no doubt that Jarrett McKane could give good old Preston a run for the title. Intimidator.

She released a breath and put on a smile. "Mr. McKane. It's good of you to come."

Jarrett turned toward her, his eyes showing some surprise and interest, and he returned a smile, showing off a row of straight white teeth. Oh boy. He was going to try to charm her.

"Ms. Saunders?"

"That would be me."

He walked to the table, pulling off his leather gloves then he held out his hand. "It's a pleasure to meet you, Ms. Saunders. I must say I've enjoyed your colorful letters."

She tried not to react as his large hand engulfed hers. Get down to business, she told herself and withdrew her hand.

"Well, they seem to have worked. You're here." She motioned to the chair across from her. "Please have a seat and we can begin."

Jarrett McKane didn't like this woman having the upper hand. Well, it wasn't going to last long. He eyed the pretty, long-haired brunette. Even tied back into a ponytail, those curls seemed to have a mind of their own. Her eyes caught his attention right off, a dark, smoky blue. She looked to be in her mid-twenties. He hated trying to guess women's ages, but he knew she was old enough.

He slipped off his jacket and she watched with interest. He liked that. Maybe this would be easier than he thought.

Mia Saunders glanced down at the paper in front of her. "As I stated in my letters, Mr. McKane, there are several apartments that need your immediate attention. The bathrooms in several of the units aren't working properly, and many of the heaters aren't functioning at all. They're outdated and possibly dangerous." She looked up. "The conditions here are becoming unlivable, Mr. McKane." She slid the list across the table to him. "We need you to fix these items immediately."

Jarrett read over the itemized page. He already knew it would cost him a fortune. "And the previous owner should have taken care of these problems."

"Since you are the current owner, Mr. McKane, it's your responsibility now."

He glared at her.

She ignored it. "I'm sure you bought this property at a reduced price, and a good businessman would know the condition of the place. And since you are the owner now, we're asking that you please address these problems."

Jarrett glanced around at the group. He hadn't expected to find this when he arrived, especially not mainly senior citizens. He pushed away any sentimentality. "I can't fix these problems."

"Can't or won't?" she retorted.

"I don't see how that matters."

"It does to us, Mr. McKane."

“Okay, for one thing, I haven’t received any rent payment since I took over the property.”

“And you won’t until we see some good faith from you. Some of these people don’t have hot water or heat. Winter is here.”

“Then relocating you all is the only answer.” He stood. “Because in a few months, I’ll be tearing the place down.”

The group gasped, but Mia Saunders still looked calm and controlled as she said, “I don’t think so, Mr. McKane.”

Jarrett was surprised by her assertiveness. He wasn’t used to that, especially not from a woman. No that wasn’t true, his sister-in-law, Kira, gave him “what for” all the time.

Ms. Saunders held up another piece of paper. “We all have leases giving us six months to relocate. When you bought the building, your lawyer should have told you about it. Unless you didn’t use an attorney.”

Dammit, he didn’t have an answer to that.

“And you still have to honor our leases.”

He shook his head. “Can’t do it. I want to start demolition by the first of the new year. And I’m sure the town council will go along with me since this is the site for a new computer-chip plant. It’s estimated to bring over a hundred jobs to this town.” He saw the panicked looks on the tenant’s faces and added, “And I’ll help anyone who wants to be relocated, but I can’t let you stay here for six months.” Finished, he headed toward the door.

“You might not have a choice,” Mia called to him.

He turned around, perversely enjoying the exchange. He liked the fire in her pretty eyes, the set of her jaw. He wondered if he could find a way to sway her loyalty. A little dinner and maybe some romancing might help his cause. "I don't think you can win this fight, Ms. Saunders. But I'm willing to discuss it with you, another time."

She rose from her chair and that was when he noticed her rounded belly. Pregnant? Damn, she's pregnant.

Mia Saunders seemed to enjoy the surprise. "You can count on it, when we see you in court."

Thirty minutes later, Jarrett was still thinking about the attractive Mia Saunders as he drove his Range Rover down the highway. He shook his head. What the hell was he doing fantasizing about a pregnant woman? A woman carrying another man's baby.

He turned off onto the road leading toward the McKane ranch. After selling off his part of the family cattle ranch, he hadn't called in here much to start with. He and his half brother, Trace, hadn't gotten along while they were growing up, but the past few years that had slowly begun to change. Maybe he was getting soft. Of course, his brother's wife, Kira, had a lot to do with it.

Now, he was an uncle and he was crazy about his niece, Jenna. She could ask him to walk over hot coals, and he'd do it, smiling. At three years old, the toddler had his number.

He parked around the back of the house. They hadn't always been a happy family: he recalled just a while back when Trace and Kira were barely surviving a crumbling marriage. Kira's problems getting pregnant had put a strain on them that had nearly ended their five-year relationship. Then a miracle had happened, and now they had Jenna.

Climbing the back steps to the century-old ranch house, Jarrett's attention turned to another pregnant woman, Mia Saunders. It was true what they said about expectant mothers, they did have a glow about them. And unless he had been mistaken, she'd directed that rosy glow toward him.

He knocked on the door and walked in. "Everyone decent?" He peered into the kitchen, knowing he'd be welcome. That hadn't always been true. There was a time he'd tried everything to one-up his younger brother. In their youth, he had wanted nothing to do with the ranch, or with the half brother who'd gotten all the attention. So, after their father died, Jarrett had accepted his share in dollars.

It had taken them years to work out their differences. And with the help of Kira and a sweet little girl named Jenna they'd worked through a lot of their problems, mainly just trying to be brothers.

Kira stood at the stove. "We have a three-year-old. There isn't any time to get indecent." His sister-in-law smiled as she came to him and gave him a kiss on the cheek. "Hi, Jarrett. It's good to see you."

"Hi, sis," he said, returning the hug. He'd used to have trouble with her being so demonstrative, but she said they were family, and that was how family acted.

Jarrett heard a squeal and little Jenna came charging into the room.

“Unca Jay. Unca Jay,” the girl called.

Jarrett caught her up in his arms, swung her around, kissing her cheeks and blowing raspberries. “How’s my Jenna girl today?”

The child’s tiny mouth formed a pout. “Mommy put me in time-out. I was sad.”

Kira arrived on the scene, brushing back her long blond hair. “Tell Uncle Jarrett what you did.”

“I got into Mommy’s makeup.”

Suddenly, Jarrett could see the faint remnants of lipstick on her mouth. “Uh-oh.”

“I just want to be pretty, like Mommy.” She turned those big brown eyes on him. “Are you mad at me, too?”

“Never.” He kissed her. “But you’re already pretty, you don’t need makeup.” He glanced at Kira. “But remember you don’t like anyone getting into your stuff, so you shouldn’t get into other people’s things.”

“Kay.” She looked at her mom. “Can I play now? I promise to be good.”

Kira nodded, and they watched the child run out of the room. She turned to Jarrett. “Thanks for backing me up.”

He nodded. “I don’t know how you ever punish her. It would tear me up.”

“It part of being a parent.”

“That’s a job I don’t want.”

Kira smiled. “You just haven’t found the right woman.”

He arched an eyebrow. “I’ve found a lot of women and I like it that way. There’s safety in numbers.” He winked at her. “Among other things.”

She shook her head. “Like I said, you haven’t found the right woman.”

“But I found mine.”

They both looked toward the door to see Trace. His brother went straight to his wife and kissed her. Jarrett hated the envy that engulfed him. To his surprise, his thoughts turned to Mia Saunders again. Well, damn.

“Hi, bro,” Jarrett greeted him. “How’s the cattle business?”

“If you came out here more, you’d know for yourself.”

“If I came out here more, you’d put me to work. You know how I feel about ranching. I’m doing just fine the way things are.”

“I take it you’re still trying to get by on your looks and your wit. So what brings you out here?”

Jarrett shrugged. “Do I need a reason?”

Trace hugged his wife close. “Of course not. Stay for supper.”

Jarrett smiled. “Don’t mind if I do.” Whatever had happened during their childhood didn’t seem to mean much anymore. It had taken years, but Jarrett had finally realized that Trace wasn’t competing with him. After they’d found natural gas on McKane land a few years ago, they’d worked together and ensured a prosperous future for them all.

They also found they could be friends.

Kira went to check on Jenna while Trace poured two mugs of coffee. He handed one to Jarrett and the brothers sat down at the large farm kitchen table.

“So, I hear you bought the old apartment buildings on Maple.”

Jarrett frowned. He’d been trying to keep the project quiet.

“Where did you hear that?”

“It’s a small town. There aren’t many secrets.”

Kira returned. “We heard it at church last Sunday. One of your tenants, her brother used to be our pastor. Reverend Brad Saunders.” She shook her head. “It was such a tragedy about their deaths.”

“I don’t go to church. What happened to them?”

“A few months ago Brad and his wife, Karen, went on a missionary trip and their small plane crashed in Mexico. Poor Mia.”

“What about her husband?”

Kira raised an eyebrow. “Mia doesn’t have a husband.”

Interest sparked in Jarrett, catching him off guard. “Surely the guy responsible for the baby will step up.”

Kira exchanged a glance with Trace. “There is no guy to step up. It’s not Mia’s baby.”

Chapter Two

JARRETT stared at his sister-in-law. “Okay, it’s been a few years since Biology 101, but I would remember something like this.”

“Mia is a surrogate,” she explained. “Or maybe I should say she was.”

“There’s definitely still a baby,” he added, recalling the generous curve of her stomach.

“But no parents.”

“So what’s the story?”

Kira gave her husband a quick glance. “It wasn’t exactly public knowledge, but Mia is carrying her brother and sister-in-law’s baby.”

“The hell you say!”

Suddenly Jenna came running into the kitchen. “Unca Jay, you said a bad word.”

Jarrett ignored Trace’s disapproving stare. “I’m sorry, sweetie,” he told her. “I’ll try to be better.”

“You got to give me a nickel for the jar.” The child held out her tiny hand and smiled. “Pay me.”

The little thief. With a smile he dug into his pocket. “Here’s a quarter.”

“Jenna, go wash up for supper,” her mother said.

“Okay, Mommy.” She smiled and went and hugged Trace.

“Hi, Daddy.”

While father and daughter exchanged pleasantries Jarrett tried to wrap his head around this news.

Once the child left, Jarrett turned back to Kira. “Was Mia Saunders going to give the reverend and his wife her baby?”

Kira shook her head. “No, she’s been carrying Brad and Karen’s baby all along. Surely you’ve heard of a fertilized embryo being implanted in another woman and she carries the baby when the biological mother can’t. In this case, Mia was doing this for her brother and his wife.”

Kira got up from the table, went to the oven and checked the roast, then she returned to the table. “But now everything has changed with Brad and Karen’s death. Mia will not only be giving birth to her niece or nephew in about six weeks, but now she’ll be raising the baby, too.”

In the past, Jarrett had always run as far as possible from romantic entanglements. He didn’t do relationships beyond a few months, no matter how beautiful or intriguing the woman. It would mean he’d have to put his feelings on the line, to be vulnerable—something he’d avoided since he’d been a kid when his mother had died. Still grieving, he’d soon learned that his father’s new wife didn’t want to deal with someone else’s kid.

He’d concluded a long time ago he wasn’t cut out to be a family man.

Yet, this woman caused him to pause. Why was he even giving her a second thought?

A woman with a baby?

He recalled the scene from earlier that day in the community room filled with all those elderly tenants and how Mia Saunders had led the pack. Those amazing blue eyes had dared him to challenge her demands. She'd tried to act tough, but he could see her nervousness.

"Does she have any other family?"

Kira shook her head. "From what I heard there was only her brother. Since her brother was a pastor, Brad and Karen didn't exactly have a fat bank account. Mia had been going to law school, but she had to drop out after the accident. I know she does Web design because she works from home, which is important now with the baby coming. The church is helping as much as possible."

And he was about to throw her out of her home. "When is the kid due?"

"Would you believe Christmas day?" Kira smiled. "I feel that's a good omen. I believe there's a miracle out there for her."

Jarrett hoped it happened before the New Year.

"They have the best food around," Jarrett told Neil Fulton the next afternoon at lunch. "Prime Cut's Barbecue is outstanding. It's all local beef, too. Some of it comes from my brother's ranch."

The fifty-five-year-old business executive looked as if he'd spent a lot of time behind a desk. His skin was pale and his hair thinning. "You own part of that, too?"

“No, I got out of ranching a long time ago.” Jarrett hadn’t liked all the hard work or a father who drove him to do more than a kid should have to do. For what? To wait out another drought, low cattle prices or a freezing winter without going bankrupt. And you’re still poor. He liked the finer things in life, and he’d found a way to get them.

“But my brother is good at what he does. I guarantee you’ll love the beef.”

“Maybe another time, I usually eat a lighter lunch.” Neil looked over his half-glasses at Jarrett. “My wife insists on it.”

Jarrett would do everything he could to move this deal along. With the slow economy, he needed to make sure this sale didn’t fall through. If only he could find a place for the Mountain View tenants, life would be perfect.

“Why not have the best of both worlds?” he said. “If you lived around here, you could enjoy hearty meals, because there’s plenty of hiking and skiing around to keep you in shape. And there’s a great gym where you can work out.”

Neil smiled. “You’ve kept in shape well enough since you left football. How do you do it?”

Jarrett couldn’t believe people still remembered his college career. But he’d use it if it helped seal the deal with Fulton Industries.

“I have a home gym,” he explained. “You and your wife will have to come by and I’ll show you. It’s Robin, isn’t it?”

Fulton nodded, then returned to scanning the menu.

"I also want to show you both some houses in the area. There are several estates with horse property. Riding is another great way to keep in shape."

Neil raised a hand. "First, I need to put all my energy into building this plant. Robin will stay in Chicago until we can get things moving along. From past experience, once my wife gets going on a new house, she'll throw herself into decorating it."

"Well, when that happens I'll have one of my top agents help her find the perfect house."

Neil frowned. "You don't know Robin. She's hard to please."

Jarrett bet he could handle her. "Then I'll work with her personally."

Neil laughed. "You may live to regret that offer."

Before Jarrett could respond, a young man approached the table. "Excuse me, sir, are you Jarrett McKane?"

"Yes, I am."

The guy pulled out a manila envelope from inside his jacket. "This is for you." He smiled. "You've been served."

Jarrett felt his face heat with anger. Then he glanced across the restaurant as the man stopped at a table. He sat down beside a dark-haired woman. Mia Saunders.

"Is there a problem, Jarrett?" Neil asked.

"No. Just a minor disagreement with a client."

Mia raised a hand and waved.

"This doesn't have anything to do with our project, does it?"

Jarrett nodded at Mia. "Like I said it's a minor problem."

Nothing I can't handle."

The following morning, Mia drove to her doctor's appointment in Grand Junction, about forty miles away. The roads were clear so far, and she only hoped that northwest Colorado's winter weather would hold off for another month.

Since she was in her last trimester, she had to travel there regularly. Not a problem; she liked her doctor, Lauren Drake. In her forties, the attractive fertility specialist had been there for her from the beginning of the surrogacy. She'd also supported Mia through Brad and Karen's horrible accident and death.

"How have you been feeling?"

"Great," Mia said. "Except the baby is pretty active. He or she is kicking all the time."

The attractive blonde was tall and slender and happily married to her college sweetheart. Mia should hate her for her perfect life, but Lauren was too nice to hate. She had become a good friend. And Mia needed as many friends as she could get.

"I know the pregnancy is going well, but I'm worried about you, Mia. Your life has been turned upside down in the past few months. And now, you aren't even sure about a place to live."

"So what else is new?" Sadness crept in. She missed her brother desperately. He'd been her rock for most of her life. Even with Brad's help, it had taken her years to get her act together. Now, she felt on the verge of falling apart. What kind of mother would that make her? Not a good one.

"I know you've had to deal with a lot," the doctor said. "You only planned to be the aunt to this baby. Now, you're going to be the mother, unless you've changed your mind on that."

Mia shook her head. Well before Brad and Karen had moved ahead with the surrogacy, everyone had agreed that if something ever happened to them, Mia would raise the child. Yet, no one had ever imagined the loss of both parents even before the baby arrived.

"It's a big responsibility, Mia. Even when there's a father in the picture."

Mia added, "A single mother with no money and no apparent means of income isn't the best candidate."

"Don't say that."

Mia hadn't hidden anything from the doctor before the procedure began. Dr. Drake knew about everything in her past.

"There are agencies around to help, too."

Mia shook her head. She had some money set aside. And Brad and Karen had some left-over insurance money. "I just want a job."

"I'd prefer you didn't take any more on your plate right now."

Mia fought her panic. "Is there something wrong?"

Lauren shook her head. "Just watching your blood pressure. It's a little high, but no worries right now." She quickly changed the subject. "Have you picked out any names?"

"No, I haven't thought about it." She had some personal things of Karen's, a baby book that might give her a clue and a letter from her sister-in-law that Mia wasn't supposed to open until the birth of the baby.

“Well, do it. And stop trying to take on everyone’s problems. Think about yourself for a change. You won’t get the chance after the baby comes.”

Mia knew she couldn’t walk away from her neighbors. Not now. They’d been so good to her. “We’re just trying to stay in our homes for a little while longer. We’re going to court next week, and we’re hoping the judge will rule in our favor.”

Having a place to live was her main concern right now. She couldn’t be homeless again. Not with a baby.

A week later, Jarrett walked into the courtroom. What he didn’t expect to see were several of the tenants there, too. Of course, leading the pack was Mia Saunders.

She looked professional in her dark skirt and a long wine-colored sweater draped over her rounded stomach. Her rich brown hair was pulled back from her oval face and clipped at the base of her neck. She didn’t wear makeup. She didn’t try to highlight her already striking blue eyes or her rosy-hued lips. She did nothing to enhance her good looks. She didn’t need to.

He wasn’t interested in her anyway. She had issues he didn’t want to deal with. Yet it seemed he would be dealing with her whether he liked it or not. He hoped today would end any and all future meetings.

That was why he’d brought his lawyer. Matthew Holliston wasn’t only his attorney but a longtime friend from high school. And he was damn good at his job.

Although, when Matt had heard that Judge Barbara Gillard was going to hear the case, he'd been worried. She had a reputation as a tough judge, and something else went against Jarrett. Years ago, he had dated Judge Gillard's sister, Amy, in high school. It hadn't ended well, so Matt had suggested that he make a generous offer to the building tenants. They had written up something to appease the judge and, they hoped, the tenants.

"Good morning, Ms. Saunders," Jarrett said.

She nodded. "Mr. McKane."

He was quickly drawn into her sparkling gaze and lost the ability to say more. That was when Matt stepped in and guided him to his seat.

The court deputy soon called their case. "The Mountain View tenants versus Jarrett McKane Properties."

"Here, your honor," Matt acknowledged. He and Jarrett went to the front of the courtroom.

"We're also here, your honor." Mia Saunders walked up with two elderly people.

Everyone waited in silence as Judge Gillard glanced over the case papers in front of her. There were also pictures and estimates for several repairs. The judge's gaze turned to Jarrett. "How can you expect your tenants to live like this?"

Jarrett started to speak, but Matt stepped in. "Your honor, as you read in our deposition, my client only purchased the property three months ago."

The judge just looked at him, then said, "I assume, Mr.

McKane, you did a walk-through of the property before purchasing it so you had to know the conditions. And if that wasn't enough, Ms. Saunders contacted you several times. So you should have, at least, begun to make some of the repairs."

"Your honor," Matt tried again. "It would be a waste of time and money. Mr. McKane will be demolishing the building so a factory can be built there—a computer-chip plant that will bring several new jobs into the area."

"Your honor," Mia Saunders interrupted. "The tenants had to sign a lease agreement when they moved in. It states that if the property is ever sold they have six months to relocate." She flashed a cold stare at Jarrett, then went on. "Even with the change of ownership, until each tenant is contacted about their eviction, they still have five months and three weeks to stay in their apartments."

Matt fought back. "Your honor, isn't six months a little excessive? A thirty-day notice is a standard agreement now."

The judge looked at the lease in her hand. "Well, this agreement is from 1968." She glanced over her glasses. "But no one thought to change it." She held up the photos. "I'm more concerned that many of these apartments aren't suitable to live in."

Nola stepped forward and introduced herself. "Your honor, I'm Nola Madison, one of the longtime tenants. May I speak?"

The judge nodded. "Yes, Mrs. Madison, you may."

The tiny woman made her way to the front. "Many of us have lived at Mountain View Apartments for a long time. It's our home, and like all of us, it's getting old. With a little work and some minor repairs, we can live comfortably for the winter. Please don't ask us to leave yet."

"You know that in six months you will have to move anyway," the judge told her.

Nola glanced around to her group of friends and neighbors. "Next week is Thanksgiving, your honor. For years a lot of us have spent it together. Christmas, too. If this is our last year, I really would like to be with my friends. My family. And we need the time to find affordable places to live and to save the extra money to move. So staying until March would be helpful."

Seeing the judge blink several times, Jarrett knew he was in big trouble.

"Your honor," Matt tried again. "This is not a good situation, but there is an important business deal pending here. A factory is to be built on this site. A factory that will bring jobs into our community."

The judge straightened. "From which your client will benefit nicely, I'm sure. While these people will lose their homes." She glared daggers toward Jarrett. "Mr. McKane, you knew the conditions of the lease, and you also knew the deplorable condition of the building when you made the purchase."

He didn't agree or disagree. "What I had planned was to help the tenants relocate," he replied.

The judge wasn't buying it. "Seems to me if you'd been sincere you would have answered their letters three months ago,” she observed. “Now you’re throwing them out of their homes as though nothing matters as long as you make a profit. Well, it’s not always about profit, Mr. McKane. My ruling is that you make the necessary repairs to bring the building up to code. I’ll waive the fine as long as you begin immediately.”

Jarrett bit the inside of his mouth. “Yes, your honor.”

“Don’t think that’s all there is, Mr. McKane. You’re to make all repairs so the place is livable.” Judge Gillard paused and looked at Mia Saunders. “Is there a vacant apartment?”

Mia nodded. “Yes, your honor, but the apartment is unlivable.”

The judge nodded. “Good. What’s the number?”

“Two-oh-three-B.”

“Jarrett McKane, I order you to move into apartment 203B at Mountain View complex until all repairs are completed. No eviction until March first. Although, I do want to see you back here after the holidays to learn about your progress.” She hit the gavel on the block. The sound echoed around the courtroom. “Court adjourned.”

“Judge, this is highly irregular,” Matt called, but she had already exited the courtroom.

That left Jarrett thinking about everything he was about to lose. No, he couldn’t lose this. He’d fix this, like he’d fixed everything all his life. He’d figure out a way to get what he wanted. He always did.

The next day, Jarrett and Matt parked in front of the Mountain View Apartments. “You can’t bend any of the rules, Jarrett,” Matt told him. “You have to sleep here every night, eat here and even work here. You can only go to your home to get more clothes and food, that’s all, or the judge could toss you in jail. You know she means business when she instructed me to escort you here personally.”

“Dammit, Matt, you’d better get me out of this mess. If Fulton finds out, he’ll walk away from the deal.”

“Well, unless he’ll wait until April, you’re in big trouble. The only alternative you have is talking them into moving out.”

Jarrett was frustrated. Thanks to Mia Saunders, he had to figure out something. But honestly there weren’t many options since housing was limited in Winchester Ridge.

He looked toward the yellow-and-brown structure with the peeling paint and sagging rain gutters. It seemed even worse with winter-bare trees, but the grass was cut and the hedges trimmed.

“In its day, the place was probably a showcase,” Matt observed.

“Well, it’s not 1960,” he told his friend. “And I’m only going to do the minimum that needs to be done. It’s a waste of time and money.”

Jarrett looked out the Mercedes’ windshield to see someone coming toward them. It was the older woman, Mrs. Madison. He pressed the button so the window went down.

“Hello, Mr. McKane.” She slowly made her way to the car.

"I'm not sure if you remember me, I'm Nola Madison."

He got out of the car. "Were you checking up to see if I was coming?"

She smiled despite his rudeness. "As a matter of fact, we were watching for you, but only to warn you about what to expect in your apartment." She shook her head. "It was once the manager's, but he didn't take very good care of it. We tried the best we could to clean it up." She held out a key dangling from a heart keychain. "But I'm afraid it needs more work than any of our places."

Feeling like a heel, Jarrett took the key from her, and pulled his jacket together against the cold. "You shouldn't be out in this weather, Mrs. Madison."

"Please, call me Nola. Let's go inside, but it isn't much warmer."

Jarrett grabbed his duffel bag from the back of the car, asked Matt to have his car brought over from the office, and followed the woman up the walk. They went into a bare lobby. He'd seen this area before and knew how bad it looked, but it hadn't mattered to him, since it was tagged for demolition. He headed for the elevators to find signs that read, Out of Order.

On the walk-through of the property he hadn't noticed that. "There is no elevator?"

She shook her head. "Not in the last year."

Jarrett recalled that day in the community room—two of the tenants were in wheelchairs. "How do the handicapped get upstairs?"

She led him to the wrought-iron staircase and they started the climb. "Oh, we found two tenants who were willing to move upstairs, and Joe and Sylvia's son, Ryan, built ramps for both Margie and Harold. Now they can get in and out of their apartments. It's important to be independent."

"Who exchanged apartments?"

"Well, Mia was one who moved upstairs, and when her brother, Reverend Brad, was alive he used to help us with a lot of repairs. Many of his congregation did, too."

"Where was the owner? Some of these repairs are required by law."

She shook her head. "He threatened to double our rent if we kept complaining. So we started fixing things ourselves." They made it to the second floor. "But some things we can't fix. We need an expert."

Once again he was confronted with dingy walls and worn carpet. They passed a few doors, then she stopped in front of his apartment. He paused. Hell, he was afraid to go inside.

Suddenly the door across the hall opened and Mia Saunders stepped out. She actually smiled at him and he felt a strange tightness in his chest. "Moving in, Mr. McKane?"

She was dressed in a long blue sweater that went to midthigh, with a pair of black leggings covering those long legs. He looked back at her face. "Seems I am. Looks like we're going to be neighbors."

"Isn't that nice," Nola said, then glanced at her watch. "Oh, my, I just remembered I have a doctor's appointment. I don't know where my head is today. Mia, could you show Mr. McKane around?"

Mia frowned. "Do you need a ride, Nola?"

"No, thank you, dear, my daughter is coming by." With a wave, the older woman walked off.

Mia didn't like Nola's not-so-subtle disappearing act. Why did anyone need to show Jarrett McKane around?

She walked to the apartment entrance. "Brace yourself." She swung open the door, reached in and flicked on the lights, then motioned for him to go inside first. He frowned and stepped into the main room. She heard his curse and couldn't help but smile as she followed him in.

The apartment walls needed paint, but not before numerous holes in the plaster were patched. Under the slipcovers that Nola and her welcoming committee had recently put on, the furniture was thrift-store rejects.

"Joe cleaned the carpet, or what's left of it. It's probably the original. At least the place doesn't smell as if someone died in here anymore."

Without comment, he continued down the hall and peered into the bath. Again another curse.

She called after him. "It might not look very good, but I can guarantee you Nola and Sylvia cleaned it within an inch of its life. And there are fresh towels. And they made up the bed for you, too." Then she murmured to herself, "Why they're being so nice to you, I have no idea.”

The good-looking Jarrett McKane came out and stood in front of her. His dark hair had been cut and styled recently. His clothes were top-of-the-line, too. Everything about him rang out success and power. So why was she even noticing him?

Hormones, she concluded. It was just late-pregnancy hormones. She'd learned a long time ago to stay away from men like him.

“Why did they do all this?” he finally asked.

Jarrett McKane was standing too close, but she refused to step back. She refused to let him intimidate her.

“It’s their way of being neighborly,” she told him. “It’s the same with everyone here. Over the years, they’ve all become a family. Some are alone. Some have family that didn’t have time for them so they take care of each other.”

“Or it’s their way to get me to not tear the place down.”

She smiled, not wanting him to see her anger. “It’s just some towels and linens and a few home-cooked meals. But yes, they feel it’s worth a try. Enjoy your stay.” She turned and started to leave when he called her name.

When she turned around, he gave her a sexy grin. “Did you do anything to sway me, Ms. Saunders?”

Her heart began to pound in her chest. “There might be a plate of oatmeal raisin cookies on the kitchen counter.”

“I’m looking forward to seeing how far you’ll go to persuade me.”

Mia arched her aching back, causing her stomach to be front and center. “I’m afraid cookies are as far as I’m willing to go.”

Chapter Three

MIA couldn't get out of there fast enough.

She stepped inside her apartment and closed the door. She didn't want Jarrett McKane in her life, or in her space. And he was suddenly in both.

A long time ago, she'd learned about men who thrived on control. Her father was one of those. It had taken her years to get out from under his reign and finally to be free of him.

She walked across her cozy living area. A secondhand sofa and chair faced the small television. A triangular rug hid a lot of the worn carpet underneath. A small table off the galley kitchen was used for eating and for working on her computer.

Her laptop was the only thing of value that she had and the only means she had these days of make a living. Despite her privileged upbringing, she'd never been materialistic. Maybe that was the reason it had been so easy to walk away, or in her case, run away.

To Preston and Abigail Saunders their daughter had always been a problem, a disappointment from the start. An overweight child, Mia had morphed into a rebellious teenager. She had never fitted into her Boston society family. So, once she was of age, she'd just disappeared from their lives.

Even Brad had eventually bucked their father's plans for him. Instead, her older brother had become an ordained minister and had ended up disowned, too.

Now she'd lost her only family. She caressed her stomach, feeling the gentle movement of the baby. At least she'd have a part of Brad and Karen and she vowed to love and protect this child. So she wasn't about to let her parents know where she was. Or let them find this baby.

Mia sat down in the chair, still in awe of the life she carried inside her. Onetime wild child, Margaret Iris Ashley Saunders was going to have a baby. She blew out a breath. She was going to be a mother and D-day was approaching soon. There were so many things she had to get done before Christmas.

She closed her eyes. For months, she'd had to push aside all the feelings she was having for this baby. A mother's feelings. The only thing that had saved her was knowing this child would always be in her life. Brad and Karen would have been the perfect parents and she could be the favorite aunt who spoiled the child.

Now, Mia had to step up and be a parent to this baby. She wasn't sure she was cut out to do it.

That afternoon, with the help of his office staff, Jarrett had made several phone calls. He'd finally found someone to start on the repairs. A local furnace repairman was to come out. He'd also contacted the handyman who serviced some of his other properties to help out with some of the minor fixes.

Flipping his phone shut, he decided to wait downstairs and get out of his depressing apartment for a while. In the hall, the door across from his opened and Mia walked out carrying a large trash bag. She stiffened the second she saw him.

He smiled. "Hello, Mia."

She nodded stiffly. "Mr. McKane."

She was dressed in her standard black pants and oversize blouse, but with an added long sweater for warmth.

"I don't see why we can't be on a first-name basis since we're going to be neighbors."

"You're the man who's evicting us. Why would I get friendly with the enemy?"

He took the bag from her. "It doesn't seem to bother the others." He gave her a sideways glance. "Someone must have really have done a number on you."

She glanced away. "Now you're a psychiatrist?"

"No, just observant."

"Well, observe somewhere else. Thanks to you, I have a lot on my mind."

He wasn't crazy about having to move her in her condition. "I'm not your enemy, Mia. I'm trying to find all of you places to live."

"We can't afford most of the other places."

Was that his fault? "The rent here is well below average for this area. Even if I kept the place and did all the repairs, I'd have to raise the rent."

"Well, you can't yet. Some of us are barely getting any heat or hot water."

"I'm taking care of that."

"I can't tell you how many times we heard that from the last owner."

"The last owner hadn't been court-ordered," Jarrett said. He slowed his pace so she could keep up. He knew little or nothing about pregnant women. Only that Kira had had a rough time with her pregnancy and had had to stay in bed the last few months.

"That's where I'm going now," he continued, "to meet with a furnace guy."

She stopped. "You mean we could have some heat today?"

He shrugged. "I'm paying him extra to start right away."

They continued their way down the stairs to the main lobby. "I would like to ask a favor," he said.

She paused with a glare.

He hid a smile as he raised a hand. "Good Lord, woman, do you mistrust everyone? I only want you to help get everyone together so we see who has the worst problems and fix them first."

"Then come to the community room. It's where a lot of the tenants hang out because it has a working heater."

They stepped outside into the frigid weather. He first tossed the sack into the Dumpster, and then they continued on to the center.

"I hear your baby is due on Christmas day."

She gave him a sideways glance. "Who told you that?"

"My sister-in-law, Kira McKane. You both go to the same church."

She seemed relieved. "How does she feel about you tossing us out of here?"

"I haven't tossed out anyone, and according to the judge, I won't be able to until the spring." Not with Barbara Gillard watching him anyway. If only he could come up with a way to convince everyone to leave a few months earlier.

His only other chance was to get Fulton to hold off on the takeover date. They couldn't begin construction until the ground thawed. But he wouldn't get his money either.

He'd put a lot into this project, buying up the surrounding land, including this place. He had too much to lose. And it would cost him even more every day Mountain View Apartments stayed open. And now he was being held prisoner here.

While Jarrett went to the community room, Mia knocked on Joe's door and asked him and Sylvia to gather the other tenants and bring them to the community room.

Sending the others on ahead, Mia then went to Nola's place and they walked over together. "We need to make sure you have enough heat, Mia," Nola said. "For you and the baby."

They went through the door of the community room to see a dozen or so tenants already there. "I'm fine for now," Mia answered. Her apartment wasn't too bad. "I wouldn't mind a new faucet for the sink, though. It came off last week."

"You should have told Joe."

"I wasn't going to complain when there are apartments with bigger problems."

Nola gave her a tender look. "You and the baby are a priority."

Mia smiled. Everyone here had rallied around her like overprotective grandparents since they'd heard the tragic news. "He's not even here yet."

"It's a boy?" Joe said, walking over to them.

"I don't know," she insisted. "So you haven't won the baby pool yet."

The older man grinned. "It's a boy all right. He's going to be born at 12:05 on the twenty-fifth of December."

Mia looked up to see Jarrett walk in, followed by a middle-aged man with Nichols Heating and Air printed across his shirt pocket.

"Good, most of you are here," Jarrett began. "This is Harry Nichols. He's here to look at the heating units."

Several of the tenants were already on their feet to greet the repairman. Once the niceties were over, the tenants commandeered Harry and went to start the work.

With everyone gone, Jarrett walked over to where Mia sat at the table. "That seemed to please them."

She studied her new landlord. He was sure proud of himself. "Why not? It's been a while since they've had reliable heat. You'll probably be rewarded with some more baked goods."

Jarrett took a seat next to her, filling the space with his large frame. She inhaled a faint scent of his aftershave.

"I had no idea the extent of the last owner's neglect. I thought it was mostly cosmetic. Now, I'm paying a lot for the repairs."

Mia eyed his expensive clothes, leather jacket and cowboy boots. She'd seen his top-of-the-line Range Rover parked out front. "I doubt you'll starve, Mr. McKane. Besides, this isn't your only property in town."

He arched an eyebrow. "The last I heard, it's not against the law to make a living."

"No. Not unless the properties have been neglected like this one."

He looked at her with those dark, piercing eyes. "In the first place, I wasn't the one who allowed this property to fall apart. Secondly, most of my other holdings are commercial buildings. I've spent a lot of money renovating run-down properties. You can't ask for top rent without a quality product."

Why couldn't he do the same here? "Have you ever considered putting money into this place? You have a whole other section that's vacant. That's twenty-four units that are empty." She shrugged. "Like you said yourself, this town doesn't have enough rental properties. With some remodeling you could sell them as townhomes."

He studied her for a while. "Sounds like you've put some thought into this."

"When we heard that the owner was selling, the tenants tried to buy the complex themselves. They didn't have enough money, or the expertise to do the repairs."

"I doubt if anyone can keep up with the repairs of this old place. No one would want to sink the time and effort into it, without knowing if they could recoup their money. The real estate market has been unpredictable.”

He sounded like her father. “Does it always have to be about money?”

He arched an eyebrow. “It does or I go broke.”

She’d been both, and she was definitely happier like this. “I can’t believe you’d lose everything. You still have family and a home. You might lose a little money, but you’ll survive. A lot of these people won’t. They can’t afford to move and pay double the rent elsewhere.”

He frowned. “What are you going to do when the lease is up?”

She blinked, fighting her anger. “Is your conscience suddenly bothering you about evicting a single mother?”

He straightened. “I’m not happy about evicting anyone. But I don’t have a choice. This deal has been in the works for months.”

“Like I said, it’s all about the almighty dollar.”

“What about the jobs this factory will create for the town? The economy isn’t that great to turn this opportunity away.”

“Does a factory have to be built on land that drives people from their homes?”

“I will find them other places to live. I’m not that cruel—I won’t put seniors and single mothers out on the street.”

“Well, you can stop worrying about me. I don’t want your charity.”

“Fine. Let’s see where your stubbornness gets you.”

“I’ve been able to take care of myself so far.”

“Then feel free to continue.” He stood and started to leave.

She tried not to let him see her fear. She raised her chin. “I will.”

Suddenly she felt her stomach tighten and she automatically covered it with her hands.

He must have seen it, too. “Are you okay?”

She nodded as she moved her hand over her belly and rubbed it, but it didn’t help. Then her back began to hurt, too. She tried to shift in the chair, but it didn’t help.

“Mia, what’s wrong?” Jarrett asked.

She shook her head. “Nothing.”

He knelt down beside her chair. “The hell it’s nothing.”

She shook her head, looking around the empty room. There wasn’t anyone else there.

His expression softened. “Mia, let me help you.”

A sharp pain grabbed her around the middle. “Oh, no,” she gasped and then looked at him. “I think the baby’s coming.”

Fifteen minutes later Jarrett pulled up at the emergency-room doors. He threw the car into Park, got out and ran around to the passenger side. He jerked open the door. Mia was taking slow measured breaths. Not good.

“Hang on, we’re almost there.”

She couldn’t hide her worried look. “It’s too early for me to go into labor. I can’t lose this baby, Jarrett.”

“And you won’t,” he promised. He had no idea what was going on, or even if the doctors could stop the contractions. “Let’s get you inside and find some help.” He slid his arms around her shoulders and under her legs, then lifted her into his arms.

“I’m too heavy,” she said.

“Are you kidding?” He smiled, taking long strides across the parking lot. “During roundup, I used to have to hoist calves a lot heavier than you.”

“You used to work on your brother’s ranch?”

“Back when I played cowboy, it was our dad’s place. That was a long time ago.”

She studied him. “I can see you as a rancher.”

His mouth twitched. “There’s the big difference, darlin’. I never did,” he drawled as he carried her through the automatic doors.

On the drive over, Mia had phoned her doctor and been told to go to the nearest emergency room, then she’d given Nola a quick call so her friends wouldn’t worry if they noticed she was gone.

Winchester Ridge Medical Center was the closest. Once inside, they were met by a nurse who led them into an exam room. Jarrett set Mia down on the bed and stepped back out of the way. Nurses immediately took her blood pressure, asking questions about due dates and the timing of the contractions. All the while, she kept looking at him.

Jarrett tried to give her some reassurance, but he didn’t know what to say.

“Excuse me,” a nurse said, getting his attention. “Are you the father?”

He shook his head, but hesitated with the answer. "No." Mia didn't have any family.

"Then you'll have to leave while we examine her."

"I'll be right outside," he told Mia. "Just holler if you need me."

Jarrett stepped back behind the curtain and found a row of chairs against the wall. That was as far as he was going.

For the next few hours, Jarrett watched medical personal go in and out of Mia's cubicle.

But no one told him a thing.

Finally they moved her down the hall to a room so they could keep monitoring her. Recalling the frightened look on her face, he knew he couldn't leave her alone. So he followed her and camped outside her room.

He glanced up from the newspaper someone else had left and saw Nola.

He stood as the older woman walked toward him. "Mr. McKane." She gripped his hand with both of hers. "How is Mia?"

"I don't know any more than what I told you when I phoned. And the doctor won't tell me anything because I'm not a relative."

Nola nodded. "I know, I fibbed and said I was her grandmother so I could come back here."

He walked Nola to the sofa and sat down. "How did you get here?"

"One of the parishioners from the church," she said. "Joe can't drive at night, and Ralph doesn't have his license any more." She shook her head. "Mia always takes us places we need to go." The older woman blinked. "Oh, Mr. McKane, what if something is wrong with the baby?" Those watery hazel eyes turned to him. "She wants this baby so much."

He already knew that. He'd never felt so helpless and he hated that. "Nola, the doctors here are good and her specialist is here, too. So try not to worry." He put on a smile. "And will you do me another favor? Please call me Jarrett."

She beamed at him.

He'd broken one of his cardinal rules. Not to get personally involved when it came to business. A week ago if someone told him he'd be sitting here worried about a pregnant woman and a couple of dozen retirees, he'd have told them they were crazy.

An attractive blond woman in a white coat came down the hall toward them. "Are you waiting to hear about Mia Saunders?"

They both stood. "Yes, we are," Jarrett said. "I'm Jarrett McKane, I brought Mia in. This is Nola Madison, her... grandmother. How is she?"

The doctor smiled. "Nice to meet you both. I'm Lauren Drake, Mia's doctor. She's fine for now. We managed to stop the contractions, but I want her to stay overnight as a precaution."

"What about the baby?" Nola asked.

"The fetus is thirty-four weeks, so if Mia does go into labor, she could deliver a healthy baby. Of course the longer she carries it, the better."

“Well, we’ll do everything we can to make sure of that,” Nola said.

The doctor nodded. “I’m glad, because when she goes home, I want her to stay in bed for the next few weeks. She needs to avoid all stress and just rest.”

No stress, Jarrett thought. Great. He’d dumped a truck-load on her. “Is that what caused the contractions?”

“We all have to agree that a lot has happened to Mia in the past few months,” the doctor echoed. “Losing her brother and sister-in-law was traumatic for her.”

Nola spoke up. “We’ve all been trying to help her through it.”

Dr. Drake nodded. “I hope that can continue, because she’s going to need someone to be around more, or at least within shouting distance to check on her.”

“We can be there as much as she needs us,” Nola said and turned to him. “Right, Jarrett?”

Great, he was the last person Mia wanted around. “Of course. I live across the hall. I guess I could keep an eye on her.”

Thanks to the medication, Mia was feeling groggy. She didn’t like that. For years, she’d avoided any and all drugs. But if it kept the baby safe, she’d do whatever it took.

Closing her eyes, she wondered how she was going to manage over the next few weeks. She had deadlines to make, and she needed the money.

Stop! Worrying wasn’t good for the baby. She rubbed her stomach, knowing how close she’d come to delivering early. She wasn't ready for the baby. She didn't even have any diapers and very few clothes. The baby bed wasn't set up, either. She sighed. How was she going to do everything? How could she do everything and be a good mother, too? A tear slid down her cheek.

She thought back to her childhood. She'd always messed up. How many times had her father told her that? She couldn't please him no matter how hard she tried. He'd been too busy for her, but the one way she got his attention was being bad. Until he finally gave up on her altogether. No she couldn't let Brad down. She was going to be a good mother to his baby.

Mia glanced toward the door and saw Nola and Jarrett standing there. She quickly wiped away any more tears and put on a smile.

"Hi."

Nola rushed in. "Oh, sweetheart," she cried. "How are you?" Nola hugged her.

Mia relished the feeling, the love and compassion. "I'm doing better now."

The older woman pulled back. "We were so worried about you."

Mia looked at Jarrett. "I didn't want you to worry."

Nola frowned. "Of course we'd worry. You are special to us. We love you." She fussed with the blanket, smoothing out the wrinkles. "And we're going to take good care of you. Aren't we, Jarrett?"

“Looks that way,” he said, feeling awkward standing in the room.

“I can’t impose on either of you.”

“You’re not imposing on any of us. We’re happy to do it. You need someone around to help you. Jarrett and I volunteered.” She clutched her hands together. “Oh, I need to go and call the others. I’ll be right back.”

“Here, use my phone,” Jarrett said, handing it over to her. They both watched the woman walk out of the room.

Jarrett turned back to Mia. “So how do you really feel?”

“Scared, but good.”

“You need to stop that. Your doctor said you need to relax and avoid stress.”

“Did you tell her that you lived across the hall?”

He fought a smile, but lost. “Yes. Did you tell her that you and your friends brought me there?”

She met Jarrett’s gaze. Her heart sped up and the monitor showed it. “So, I guess we’re stuck with each other for a while.”

Chapter Four

THE next day, Mia arrived home the same way she'd left. In Jarrett's car. He pulled into a parking spot at the front of the building. There were two heating-and-air-conditioning-repair trucks there, along with several uniformed workers.

"Looks like we'll have heat soon," she said.

Jarrett turned off the engine and glanced out the windshield. "It's just in time. There's a snowstorm coming in tonight." He looked at her. "Soon you'll be tucked into your warm bed. But be warned, Nola is heading a welcome-home committee."

"Oh, I don't want them to go to any trouble."

"I doubt they think you're any trouble. Too bad she and her group don't run this town. A lot more would get done." He climbed out of the SUV and walked around to her side.

He pulled open the door and the cold air hit her. She shivered as she tried to climb out, but he wouldn't let her.

"Remember what the doctor said? Bed rest."

"I will as soon as I get to my apartment."

"No, as soon as I get you to your apartment." He scooped her up into his arms.

"Please, you can't carry me all the way upstairs."

"Of course not. Once I get you inside, Joe's going to take over."

She made a face at him. "Very funny."

Mia refused to admit she liked being taken care of by a big, strong man whose mere presence made her aware she was a woman. The way he smelled, his rock-solid chest and arms. She bit back a groan. Hormones. It was all just hormones.

She had to think of Jarrett McKane as the man who would be kicking them all out of their homes in a few months. Nothing more.

Sylvia held open the door to the building so they could come in. "Welcome home, Mia."

She got more greetings from a group of tenants waiting in the lobby.

"Thank you everyone. It's good to be home."

"Okay, let's get you upstairs." Jarrett continued to the stairway to her apartment.

Nola was waiting there and motioned him toward the bedroom. "Bring her in here."

"No, I can stay out here on the sofa for now."

Jarrett stopped, then said, "Doctor's orders are to put you to bed." He continued through the short hallway and into her room.

Mia blinked as they entered the bedroom. It didn't look like the same room she'd left yesterday. The dingy walls had been painted a soft buttery yellow. The furniture was rearranged and her bed was adorned with a pastel-patterned quilt.

She turned around and saw the white baby bed that had been Brad and Karen's last purchase for the baby assembled. It was decorated with yellow-and-green sheets and an animal mobile hung overhead.

Tears flooded her eyes. "Oh, my."

"Do you like it?" Nola asked. We were going to give you the quilt for Christmas but since you're going to be spending so much time in bed now, we decided not to wait." The older woman pulled back the covers so Jarrett could set her down on the snowy-white sheets.

"Oh, it's beautiful." She examined the intricate work. "How could you get all this done? I've only been gone overnight."

Nola exchanged a look with Jarrett. "We knew we had to. The scare yesterday made us realize that you've been working so hard for us, you put off getting ready for the baby." She helped Mia take off her shoes and put her feet under the blanket. "So we hope this helps you to stop worrying so much." She stood back. "And when you've rested I'll show you all the baby clothes we've collected."

Nola walked to a small white dresser. "Joe found this for you. He sanded and painted it last week and Jarrett helped bring it up. Sylvia and I washed all the baby things and put them inside. If you don't like how we arranged them, you can change it."

"I'm sure it will be perfect." Mia clasped her hands together. "I don't know what to say."

"You don't have to say anything." The older woman came to the bed and hugged her. "Just take care of yourself. We love you, Mia. You're like family."

"I love you all, too."

She'd tried for a lot of years not to get too close to people, except for Brad. Starting with her parents. Whenever she'd let people in, they'd ended up hurting her. She looked across the room at Jarrett standing in the doorway. She definitely had to keep this man away.

"Tell everyone thank you."

"I will," Nola assured her. "Now, you rest and don't worry about lunch. Sylvia will be here to fix you something."

"She doesn't have to do that."

Nola raised her hand. "She wants to. We all want to help." The older woman went out the door, followed by Jarrett. Mia called him back. "Mr. McKane, could I speak to you a moment?"

Frowning, he came toward the bed as Nola left. "Suddenly I'm Mr. McKane again."

"I appreciate everything you've done for me. It's better if we don't become too friendly...given the situation."

He studied her for a moment. "The situation you are referring to is that you've already gotten to stay here until the spring." He shrugged. "But, hey, I won't bother you again."

He turned and walked out. The soft click of the front door let her know she was truly alone. She told herself it was better this way. She couldn't get any more involved with a man like Jarrett McKane. Not that she had to worry that he'd ever give her a second look.

She rubbed her stomach. All she needed to focus on right now was her baby.

Jarrett kept hearing a ringing sound. He blinked his eyes as he reached for his cell phone on the bedside table.

“Hello,” he murmured, running a hand over his face. It was still dark outside.

“Oh, I’m sorry, did I wake you?”

It was Mia. He sat up. “Mia? Is there a problem?”

“No. No. I shouldn’t have bothered you.”

“Wait, Mia. Tell me what’s wrong. Is it the baby?”

“No, the baby’s fine. I just need a favor, but I’ll call back later.”

“I’ll be right over.” He hung up, grabbed a pair of jeans and put them on along with a sweatshirt. He grabbed his keys and phone and headed across the hall. He let himself into her apartment with his master key and hurried to the bedroom.

Mia was sitting on the bed, dressed in a thermal long-sleeved shirt that hugged her rounded belly and a pair of flannel pajama bottoms. Somehow she managed to look somewhere between wholesome and far too good at this time in the morning.

Was it morning? “What’s the problem?”

She looked embarrassed. “I’m so sorry I woke you.”

“Well, since you have, tell me what you need.”

“Could you pull out the table and see if my cable is plugged in? I didn’t want to move the table by myself.”

“You’re on the computer at this hour?”

She shrugged. “I slept so much during the day, I’m wideawake. So I thought I’d get some work done.”

Jarrett went to the bedside table and pulled it out. Seeing the loose battery cable, he knelt down and pushed it back into the outlet. "It's fixed." He moved the table back and stood next to the bed. "You're really not supposed to be working."

"I'm bored. Besides, if I don't work, I don't eat or pay my rent."

The computer screen lit up and he asked, "What are you working on?"

She kept her focus on the screen. "A Web site for a Denver-based company."

He glanced at the home-page logo. "Are you going back to law school?"

As she clicked the mouse and another program opened, she didn't show any surprise that he knew her history. "Not for a while, but I hope I can go back someday. It won't be easy with a baby."

"I'm sure everyone here would love to help you."

"We won't be living here...together," she said.

When she looked up at him with her scrubbed-clean face, large sapphire eyes and her hair in a ponytail, she looked fifteen. "How old are you?"

Mia blinked at his question. "Don't you know you're not supposed to ask a woman her age?"

He shrugged. "You look like jailbait."

"I'm twenty-nine. How old are you?"

"Thirty-seven."

She studied him for a few seconds. "You look it."

Frowning, he combed his fingers through his hair. "What's that supposed to mean?"

"What did you mean when you called me jailbait?"

"I meant it as a compliment. You look young for your age."

"Thank you." She sobered. "Are you really going to try and find us all a place to live?"

"I'm not sure I can find everyone a place, but I'll see what I can do." Was he crazy? Where would he find affordable apartments for them all? He moved away from the bed. "Man, I'd kill for a cup of coffee."

"Sorry, I'm off caffeine for a while," she told him. "But I'd fight you for a jelly donut."

"I guess that's one of those crazy cravings, huh? Well, I'd better go." He walked out, thinking a donut didn't sound so bad.

He retrieved his car keys and a jacket from his apartment and headed down to his car. The ground was covered in a dusting of snow. He climbed into his vehicle, missing the warm garage back at his house. Pushing aside his discomfort, he started the engine and the heater. He was on a quest for one hungry pregnant woman.

In every town there always seemed to be a twenty-four-hour donut and coffee shop and Winchester Ridge was no exception. He picked out a couple of dozen assorted donuts along with a large coffee and an orange juice.

He returned to the apartment building just as dawn was breaking. Funny, this wasn't how he usually spent early mornings. He'd never shared breakfast with an expectant mother, either.

With his offerings in hand, he returned to Mia's apartment and gave a loud knock before he walked in.

"It's me, Ms. Saunders. I've got something for you." After hearing Mia's greeting he walked into the bedroom.

She was still working on the computer. "I thought you went back to bed."

"Not after you talked about donuts." He raised the box. "Freshly made." He opened the large box and the aroma filled the room.

Mia groaned. "Oh, my God." She put the laptop aside and reached for one. He pulled back.

"I thought you were going to fight me for one."

She looked confused.

"Of course, if we were on a first-name basis, I'd happily share. Especially if someone had been willing to get up before dawn and help out a neighbor."

Mia was embarrassed by her actions. Yesterday after Jarrett had left, Nola had returned and told her how he'd stayed at the hospital and called everyone with any news. She was even more ashamed when she learned that he'd bought the paint for her bedroom.

"It does seem to be one-sided, doesn't it? I apologize. You have helped me so much. I don't know how I would have made it to the hospital without you."

"Did I say I minded helping you? I just don't want to keep being treated like the enemy here. I can't change things that happened in the past.”

“I know. I’m sorry, Jarrett.”

He smiled. “What did you say?”

She sighed. He wasn’t going to make this easy. “Would you be my friend, Jarrett?”

“You just want my donuts.”

She nodded. “And you’d be wise not to get between a pregnant woman and those donuts.”

He put the box down and her mouth watered as she eyed the selections. “There are so many to choose from.” She rubbed her stomach, feeling the baby kicking her.

He sat at the end of the bed. “Are you all right?” he asked as he nodded to her stomach.

“Yeah, he’s just active and hungry.”

“Does he move around like that all the time?”

“Well, the baby’s bigger now, so I feel it more.”

He handed her juice. “Here’s something to wash down your donut.”

“Thank you.” She motioned to the box. “Aren’t you going to have one, too?”

“Sure, but ladies first.”

“Wise choice.” She couldn’t help but smile as she bit into the jelly-filled treat. “Mmm, it’s so good.”

“You might not be able to have caffeine, but you’re definitely getting a sugar rush.”

Mia watched Jarrett finish off a glazed donut in record time.

He looked good even with his finger-combed hair and wrinkled clothes. There were just some men who couldn't look bad. He was one of them.

"I should let you rest." He stood, but his gaze never left hers. "Is there anything you need me to do before I go?"

She hesitated to ask him anything else.

"Come on, Mia. What is it?"

"I can wait for Nola."

"What for?"

"I need to take a shower, but the doctor said someone should be close by." She waved her hand. "Don't worry about it, Nola's coming in a few hours."

He swallowed. "How close by?"

"Just in the apartment. In case something happens there'll be someone to help me."

He stood there for what seemed like forever, and then he said, "Sure, what are friends for?"

Once Jarrett heard the shower go on, he took out his cell phone and began to check his messages. He had to get some things done today. One was to stop by the office for a few hours and check in with his agents.

Over the last couple of days, between the repairs here and keeping watch on one pregnant lady, he'd neglected his other business.

He was surprised at the next message. It was from Carrie Johnston. He smiled. The pretty blonde from Glenwood Springs he'd met at the real estate conference in Denver last summer had left him another suggestive message. She wanted to see him.

Jarrett should feel a little more excited. During their time together, the two had definitely set off sparks. So why wasn't he more interested in her invitation?

When it came to women, he'd always loved having variety in his life. So why suddenly did it seem too much trouble to make the effort? Maybe thirty-seven was too old to keep playing games.

He thought about what Mia had said, You look it.

He wasn't that old. Wasn't he considered in his prime? Okay, so most men were married by now, like his younger brother. Trace had found Kira years ago. And it had been love at first sight.

Jarrett didn't believe in that. He wasn't sure he believed in love at all.

Suddenly the bathroom door opened and Mia stepped out. She was dressed in her black stretch pants and a soft-pink sweater. Her dark hair lay against her shoulders in waves. Those big blue eyes looked at him and it became difficult to breathe. Damn. What was wrong with him? This woman came with far too many complications.

"Well, since you're finished, I'll go."

"Of course." She sat down on the sofa. "I appreciate you helping me. Thank you, Jarrett."

"Just do what the doctor told you and stay in bed. He pulled out his wallet and handed her his business card. "If you need anything."

She nodded.

"I mean it. Don't be stubborn about asking for help." He found he wanted to be the one she called.

The snow had been coming down like a holiday greeting card, but by the next afternoon, Mia was getting cabin fever.

She had watched every television talk show and finished up her work on the computer, even cried over an old movie. Neighbors stopped by with offers of help. Even parishioners from her brother's church had called her. She'd taken naps off and on for the past two days and she was still exhausted and totally bored. And no Jarrett.

"You know next week is Thanksgiving." Nola's voice broke through her reverie. "And we have a problem. The oven in the community room is broken."

"You can use mine. It's a little tricky on the temperature, but we could adjust it. It's small though. Don't we usually cook three or four turkeys?"

The older woman nodded. "Remember last year we fed those people from the mission? There were nearly fifty here."

Mia thought back to last year. She'd had family then. Brad and Karen had just begun to research surrogacy as an alternative for a baby. And by Christmas, Mia had volunteered to carry her brother and his wife's child. They all were so happy, and then in a flash she had lost them both.

Tears flooded Mia's eyes and she quickly brushed them away. She looked at Nola. "I'm sorry."

Her friend sat down beside her. "There's no reason to be sorry, dear. We all miss Brad and Karen. They were wonderful people, but they left you a child. A child you get to love and raise as your own. What a special gift."

"I do know. And I love this baby, but I'm scared. What if I can't be a good mother?"

"I have no doubt you'll be a wonderful mother. You know why? Because you're a wonderful person and this little boy or girl will be blessed to have you."

"Oh, Nola. I hope you're right."

"I am. You know what else? We're all going to be around to help you."

She cleared her throat. "I'm so glad because I'm going to need you."

Nola patted her hand. "Well, count on me. Now that that is settled, where are we going to find a big enough oven to cook our Thanksgiving Day turkeys? The ones at the church are already being used, and ours barely work. Too bad Jarrett couldn't replace the one in the community center."

"I'm not going to do that," a familiar voice said, "But I may have another solution."

Jarrett hadn't meant to eavesdrop, but he'd wanted to check on Mia and had found the door partly open.

"I overheard. You're having trouble finding working ovens."

Nodding, Nola stood. "We always feed a large group on Thanksgiving. And this might be the last one that we're all together." Her eyes brightened with tears. "You said you might have a solution."

"I have two large ovens at my house."

Nola immediately smiled. "You do?"

Jarrett stole a glance at Mia. She didn't look impressed by his offer. "Yes. When I built the house I was told it would be a good selling feature. They're like new." He shrugged. "You're welcome to them."

"Oh, my, that's the answer to our prayer." The older woman paused. "There's one condition. You have to come to our Thanksgiving celebration."

In the past Jarrett been happier to stay at home and watch football. He had gone by his brother's house last year for dessert, only because little Jenna had asked him to. He had a weakness for pretty young women. He glanced at Mia. Maybe is it was time to count some blessings. "I'd be honored to come by."

Chapter Five

HE had to be crazy to have suggested cooking Thanksgiving dinner here.

Jarrett stood back and watched as half a dozen women scurried around his kitchen. He'd told himself earlier that he wasn't going to hang around, but they'd showed up at dawn, ready and eager to begin the baking and cooking.

He had to admit that the place was filled with wonderful aromas. The one disappointment was that Mia wasn't there. It was crazy of him even to think about her at all. She was pregnant, and her life was going in one direction while he needed only to think about one thing—the computer-chip-factory project. And getting out of the jail of his crummy apartment.

Nola walked over to him. "You have a wonderful kitchen, Jarrett. Every modern convenience a woman could ever want. Seems such a waste that you don't have someone to share this with."

Jarrett smiled, but ignored her comment. "I'm glad you like it."

"Just so you know, we'll clean up everything. You won't even know we were here."

"I'm not worried. I have a cleaning service."

"Well, just the same. The place will be spotless when we leave."

Just then his phone rang. He grabbed the extension in the office. It was his brother. “Hi, Trace. Happy Thanksgiving.”

“Same to you,” Trace echoed. “I’ve been given orders to call you and see if you changed your mind about coming to dinner today.”

Kira couldn’t stand for him to be alone. “I appreciate the invitation, bro, but I seem to have a place to go. A few of the tenants have asked me to share the meal with them.”

There was a long silence. “You better be careful, no telling what they might put in your food.”

“Very funny. I do have a few friends. Besides, the tenants and I are getting along fine.”

“Well, that’s good.”

He didn’t want to talk about any apartment troubles. “I take it Kira is fixing dinner today.”

“It’ll be just us since Jody and Nathan have gone to be with Ben at the army base.”

Jarrett remembered Kira’s student who’d gotten pregnant in high school. Jody had had the child and Ben had joined the military, but he’d stayed in touch. The couple had gotten married this past summer.

Suddenly the doorbell rang. “I’ve got to go, Trace. Tell everyone happy Thanksgiving.”

After replacing the phone, Jarrett walked across the great room and into the entry. He pulled open the door to find Mia and several other people standing on his porch.

He frowned. "What are you doing out of bed?"

"I'm allowed out now. Some," she added stubbornly. "I just have to stay off my feet as much as possible."

He took her by the arm and led her to the sofa, followed by the other dozen or so tenants. "Why did you come here? We're going to bring the food back to the community room." He folded his arms. "You aren't supposed to do anything."

She nodded. I know, but there's a problem at the community room. It's flooded."

Jarrett cursed. He didn't need another thing that he had to pay for. "How bad?"

Joe spoke up. "I shut off the main valve, but there's about an inch of water on the floor."

Jarrett murmured some choice words as he turned back to Mia.

She suddenly looked unsure. "We didn't know what to do, so we came here."

Nola walked into the room. "Mia, what's wrong? Is it the baby?"

"No, I'm fine, but the community room is flooded." Mia looked back at Jarrett. "We have no place to have our dinner."

Every eye turned toward him. He had no choice. "Well, since everyone is here, I guess it'll be at my house."

Cheers filled the room, then everyone scattered to do their chores. He pulled out his phone and punched in the McKane Ranch number, wondering how he'd gotten into this situation. He glanced at Mia Saunders, those big blue eyes staring back at him. A sudden stirring in his gut told him he was headed for disaster if he wasn't careful. Hell, he'd never been careful in his life.

His brother answered the phone.

"Hey, Trace. Why don't you load up Kira and Jenna and come here? It seems I'm having Thanksgiving at my house."

Two hours later, Mia was still sitting on the large sofa in Jarrett's great room. Although it wasn't her taste, the place was decorated well. A lot of chrome-and-glass tables and black leather furniture filled the room. The most beautiful feature was the huge wall of windows and the French door that led to the deck and the wooded area at the back of the house. Although the trees were bare and a dusting of snow covered the ground, she could picture it in the spring with green trees and wildflowers along the hillside.

She turned toward the open-concept kitchen, looking over the breakfast bar to see rows of espresso-colored cabinets, and marble counter tops. The commercial-size stainless-steel appliances looked as though they were getting a rare workout today.

The dining room was on the other side, the long table already set up for the meal, along with several card tables scattered around to accommodate all the people coming today. Mia didn't even want to count them. All she knew was that her brother and sister-in-law wouldn't be at any table. These people were her family now. She rubbed her stomach. Hers and her baby's.

“Are you okay?”

She glanced up to see Jarrett standing beside the sofa. “I’m fine. Really. Thank you for having us today.”

“There wasn’t a choice, and you know it.”

“It’s still very generous that you let us use your home.”

He shrugged. “I also get a home-cooked meal.”

“You have family. And I bet you could get someone to cook for you pretty easily.”

His dark gaze held hers. “I’m pretty selective in choosing my friends.” His mouth crooked upward in a sexy smile. “Also who cooks for me.”

“Well, you’ve got some pretty good cooks in your kitchen right now.”

“I’m glad about that, because I’m getting hungry just smelling all the wonderful aromas.” He sat down across from her. “If your cookies are any indication, I’d say you know your way around a kitchen, too.”

The man was too handsome and, when he wanted to be, charming. She scooted to the edge of the sofa. “Could you direct me to the bathroom, please?”

“Of course.” He helped her up, but didn’t release his hold on her arm. They were walking toward the hall when the doorbell rang.

She looked at him. “I thought everyone was here.”

Jarrett pulled open the door to a young couple with a little girl. She recognized them from church.

“Happy Thanksgiving, Unca Jay,” the girl cried as she ran inside.

He scooped her into his arms. “Happy Thanksgiving to you too, Jenna. I’m glad you could come today. Welcome, Kira, Trace.”

They all exchanged greetings.

Jenna kept her hold on her uncle. “Mama said it must be a really special day because we never get invited to your house. She’s really happy because family should be together.”

“Jenna,” her mother warned.

“Well, you did say that,” the child acknowledged, then looked at Mia. “Who’s this lady, Unca Jay?”

“Hi, I’m Mia.”

Jarrett set her down. “I’m Jenna, and I’m almost four years old. But my daddy says I’m really thirty.” The child caught sight of Mia’s rounded stomach. “Are you going to have a baby?”

“Jenna.” Kira sent another warning glance to her daughter, and then looked at Mia. “Hi, Mia. It’s good to see you again.”

Trace removed his cowboy hat and nodded. “Hello, Mia.”

“Nice to see you, too. I hope you don’t mind that we took over Jarrett’s house.”

The pretty blonde smiled and glanced up at her husband. Love radiated between them just as Mia had seen between her brother and his wife.

“We think it’s wonderful,” Kira said. “I’m just wondering how you did it.”

“I believe a judge did it, along with several of the tenants.”

They all looked toward the living room and saw the numerous people. “Welcome to Mountain View Apartment’s Thanksgiving Day celebration.” Mia turned to Kira. “If you’ll excuse me, I need to find a restroom.”

Jarrett watched Mia walk down the hall. He wanted to go after her. Why? She was capable of finding the bathroom.

“How is she doing?”

Jarrett looked at his sister-in-law. “She should be off her feet. So would you watch her?”

“Sure. If you and Trace unload the car. I brought a few things for dinner, too. I’ll take Jenna to the kitchen and see if they need any help.”

“Just ask for Nola.”

“I know Nola Madison. I see her at church nearly every week.”

“Okay. You’ll probably know a few of the others, too.”

Once the group of seniors spotted Jenna, they began to fuss over her. His niece couldn’t get enough of the attention.

“So tell me about you and Mia Saunders,” Trace said.

Jarrett turned around. “There’s nothing to tell. She had a scare with her pregnancy and I had to take her to the hospital. The doctor ordered bed rest. She was allowed to come here, but she needs to stay off her feet.”

He glanced down the hall. “And if she doesn’t come out soon, I’m going in to get her.”

Trace arched an eyebrow. “So when did you become her protector?”

Jarrett turned to his younger half brother. Trace stared back at him.

“She doesn’t have anyone else,” Jarrett reminded him. “Remember, she lost her brother a few months back.”

Trace nodded. “Yeah, Reverend Brad was a good man,” he said, studying Jarrett. “I just never knew my brother to care much about anything that wasn’t about the almighty dollar. You must be getting soft in your old age.”

“Hey, I’m not that old.” He didn’t want to discuss his age or his relationship with Mia. They were neighbors. Temporary neighbors. “But don’t go thinking I’ve bought into the family scene.”

“Never say never, bro,” Trace challenged. “I’ve seen you with Jenna. You wouldn’t be a bad dad.”

Jarrett froze. He didn’t want to be a dad at all. His own father had been lousy at the job. “Look, as soon as I make the repairs to the complex, I’m out of there. And I won’t be looking back.”

On returning from the bathroom, Mia discovered that everyone was taking a seat at the tables. She glanced around for to find one last vacant chair. Next to Jarrett.

Smiling, he stood and pulled out her chair. “Looks like you’re next to me.”

She caught Nola smiling from across the table. Little Jenna was on the other side of Jarrett and Trace and Kira sat beside her. “I’m just happy we have a place to eat. Thank you, Jarrett, for having us here.”

Nola and Margaret stood and went into the kitchen and soon returned, each woman carrying a platter with a large turkey. The group made approving sounds as the birds were placed on the table alongside sweet potatoes, green-bean casseroles, stuffing, gravy and other side dishes too numerous to count.

Nola stood beside the table. “Before we all dig in, we should give thanks for this wonderful day.” She turned to Jarrett.

Mia watched as he nudged his brother and said something to him. Trace nodded. “Everyone, take hands and let’s bow our heads.”

Jarrett reached for Mia’s hand. His large palm nearly engulfed hers. She was surprised by the roughness of his fingers, but also by the warmth he generated.

“Dear Lord,” Trace began. “We thank you for all the blessings you’ve given us this past year. There have been some rough times, but sometimes that brings out the best in people. And today, we see that special bond as friends gather together as a family.

“We also ask for your blessing for those who aren’t here with us.” Trace paused. Mia thought about Brad and Karen. She felt Jarrett squeeze her hand. “We also ask a special blessing for Mia’s baby.

“We ask you to bless this food in your name. Amen.”

“Amens” echoed around the room.

Mia kept her head lowered, thinking of her brother and his wife. How much she missed them. Brad had always been there to guide her, to spout optimism whenever she wanted to give up. Now, she had to go on without him.

She opened her eyes to see that she was still holding hands with Jarrett. She turned to him to catch him watching her.

“Are you okay?” he asked.

“I’m fine.” She pulled her hand away. “I wish people would stop asking me that.”

“Then eat a good meal today, and we’ll get you home to bed.”

His deep voice caused her to shiver. “I can get myself to bed, thank you,” she said in a quiet voice.

“Well, one thing is for sure, you’re not climbing the steps.”

Since when did he become the boss of her? “I wouldn’t have to if you’d fix the elevator.”

He glared. “That will be Monday. I can’t get anyone out before then.”

She heard his name called and they both looked up at Nola.

“Jarrett and Trace, would you do the honor of slicing the turkeys?”

The brothers stood, went to opposite ends of the table and began to carve. The side dishes were passed around and Mia put small helpings onto her plate. With Jarrett gone, she dished up food for him, too.

“Are you Unca Jay’s girlfriend?” Jenna McKane asked from across her uncle’s empty seat.

Mia smiled. “No. We’re neighbors in his apartment building in town.”

The little girl frowned and turned to her mother. “Mommy, what’s an apartment?”

“It’s a big building with a lot of houses inside. It’s like where Aunt Michele lives.”

“Oh.” The child turned back to Mia’s stomach. “Are you going to have a baby soon?”

“Yes, I am, in just a few weeks.”

Jenna grinned. “I have a big brother, Jack. He’s old and he doesn’t live with us. So my mommy and daddy are trying to have a brother or sister for me.”

“Jenna McKane,” Kira said, giving her daughter a stern look. “You don’t have to talk so much. Now, eat.”

Kira looked at Mia. “I’m sorry. Trace and I forget how much she hears.”

Mia smiled as the platter of turkey was passed to her. She nodded toward the child eating mashed potatoes. “She’s adorable.”

Kira looked at her daughter lovingly. “She’s our miracle baby. And a very welcome surprise.” She looked at Mia. “If you ever need anything, Mia, please don’t hesitate to ask. All of us in the church want very much to help.”

Mia was touched. “Thank you, Kira. Everyone has been so generous already. I think I’ll be fine if I can find a place to live by spring.”

Before Kira could say any more, Jarrett arrived back in his seat. For the next twenty minutes everyone concentrated on the delicious food and friendly conversation. Finally the men leaned back groaning at the amount of food they'd consumed.

"There's pie, too," Nola announced as she stood and took several empty plates. She looked at Jarrett. "Jarrett, would you mind helping me with the coffeemaker? I'm not sure on the measurements."

With a nod, he stood. "Sure." He grinned. "If I get first choice of pie."

Nola smiled, too. "You think because you're good-looking, you can charm me into anything, don't you?"

"Hey, I do what I can to get an advantage." He put his arm around her shoulders. "Is it working?"

Mia never heard the answer as they walked off together.

"He's a flirt, but he's a good man."

Mia turned to Kira, but didn't know how to answer that. Was Kira trying to sell her brother-in-law's better qualities to her?

"I wouldn't have said that a few years ago," Kira went on. "But something in him has changed. And he and Trace are working on being brothers."

She turned and looked at Mia. "I know you're not happy about having to leave your apartment, but I might be able to help with that. We have a guest house at the ranch. It's small, but it has two bedrooms. A friend had been living there during college, and now she's gone to be with her husband in the army."

"Oh, Kira." Mia didn't want to get too excited. "What about Trace? I bet you haven't even asked him."

“Haven’t asked me what?” her husband turned toward her.

“About Mia coming to live in the cottage.”

He raised an eyebrow as if to think about it. “That’s a great idea. The house is sitting empty.” He shrugged. “You’re welcome to live there as long as you need.”

Mia was getting excited. “What is the rent?”

“There isn’t any rent.”

“No, I would expect to pay something.”

Trace glanced at his wife. “I think we owe your brother a bigger debt. He helped us through some rough spots a few years ago. I think Brad would want us to help you and the baby.”

“Can I come over to see the baby?” Jenna asked. “I’ll be really quiet.”

“If I decide to move there, of course, you can.” She looked at Kira. “Maybe I could even babysit you so your parents could go out.”

A big smile split Trace’s face. “That’s a deal I’ll take.”

“What’s a deal?” Jarrett sat down next to Mia.

Trace was still smiling. “Mia is coming to live in the guest house at the ranch.”

“The hell she is.”

The entire room went silent at his outburst.

“Unca Jay, you said a bad word,” Jenna piped in.

Jarrett reached into his pocket, pulled out change and set it on the table for his misstep. “Here, sweetie.” Then he turned to Mia. “You can’t move all the way out there. Not in the winter.”

She glanced around nervously. "I don't want to talk about this now," she said as she pushed away from the table. "Excuse me." She stood and walked out.

Jarrett went after her. He caught up with her right before she got to the bathroom door. She would have disappeared, but someone was using the facility.

"Mia," he called.

"Go away."

"That's not likely." He gripped her by the arm and escorted her down the hall.

"What are you doing?"

"Taking you to a bathroom."

"I don't have to go. I just needed to get away from you and your crazy idea that you can tell me what to do."

He wasn't listening as he took her by the hand, led her to the master suite and opened the door to the large room. He pulled her inside and shut the door.

"Stop this," she demanded. "And stop telling me what to do. You can't boss me around."

He glared at her. "Someone needs to take you in hand. You can't move all the way out to the ranch. If we get a snowstorm—and the possibility is strong that we will—you might not make it to the hospital when the time comes."

"I can take care of myself. And why does it matter to you, anyway? You are my landlord, Mr. McKane, not my keeper."

"Dammit, stop calling me that. It's Jarrett." He leaned closer as her eyes widened. “Say Jarrett.”

“Jarrett...”

His gaze moved to her full lips. Suddenly, he ached to know how they would feel against his and how she would taste. He couldn't resist and slowly lowered his mouth to hers. He took a gentle bite, then another. Each one a little sweeter than the last.

Her eyes widened, her breathing grew labored.

Finally, he closed his mouth over hers and wasn't disappointed. With a groan, he wrapped his arms around her and drew her closer. She made a whimpering sound and her arms move to around his neck as he deepened the kiss.

Jarrett pressed her back against the door, feeling her body against his, then suddenly something kicked against his stomach. The baby. He broke off the kiss with a gasp, suddenly remembering the situation.

Mia's shocked gaze searched his. “Why did you do that?”

“Hell if I know.” He hated that he was so drawn to her. She was a complication he didn't need, but he couldn't seem to stay away from her.

Her hand went to her stomach protectively. Was she having a contraction?

He picked her up in his arms and carried her across the room.

“What are you doing?” she demanded.

“Taking you where you should have been in the first place. To bed.”

Chapter Six

MIA was fuming as Jarrett walked out the door, leaving her alone on the bed. His bed. What she hated the most was that she didn't have much say in the matter.

All her life, she'd had to do what she'd been told. Go to the best schools, make the best grades, be the perfect daughter. It had taken years, and although she'd made many bad turns she'd finally gained her independence. She wasn't about to give it up now. Not even for a man.

She glanced around Jarrett's bedroom. Large, dark furniture dominated the spacious room, including the king-size bed with the carved headboard. The walls were a taupe-gray and the floors a wide-planked dark wood. Two honey-colored leather chairs sat in front of huge French doors that led out to a deck and the wooded area beyond. It was definitely a man's room, which reminded her she shouldn't be in here.

Mia's thoughts turned back to Jarrett McKane. What had possessed her to let him kiss her? She shut her eyes reliving the feel of his mouth against hers, his strong arms around her. What she hadn't expected was the way she had reacted to him.

Of course, she would react to the man—any man for that matter. How long had it been since she'd been in a relationship? She couldn't even remember that far back. Not that she was eager to start one now. There hadn't been any time for a man. Then Mr.

Hotshot McKane had stormed into her life, with his good looks and his take-charge attitude. No, she didn't need him in her life.

She started to get up when she felt the mild contraction and covered her midsection with her hand.

"Oh, please, no."

After several slow, relaxing breaths she eased back against the pillows and shut her eyes. Why had she come here today? Okay, she'd wanted to come to the party. And Dr. Drake had said she could be out for a few hours if she was careful and didn't overdo things.

Mia caressed her stomach, feeling the tension slowly ease from her body.

There was a soft knock and the door opened and Jarrett came in carrying a tray with a slice of pie. He stopped at the side of the bed, frowning. "You okay?"

"I'm fine," she fibbed. "I'm just resting."

He continued to stare at her. "You don't look fine."

She closed her eyes again. "Then don't look at me."

He sat the plate on the nightstand. "Are you having contractions?"

She opened her eyes. "Just a little one."

Jarrett pulled out his wallet from his back pocket and took out a business card. He grabbed the phone off the table.

"What are you doing?" she asked.

"Calling your doctor."

"You can't, it's Thanksgiving."

“Then we go to the emergency room.” He paused. “Your choice.”

Jarrett had worried this might happen if Mia left the apartment. They were lucky that Dr. Drake was on call today, and it only took her minutes to return his call.

The doctor talked with Mia, who didn’t look happy when she handed the phone back to Jarrett.

“Yes, Doctor?” he said.

“I instructed Mia not to get out of bed for anything except to use the bathroom, and I want her in my office first thing in the morning. Could you bring her in?”

“We’ll be there when your doors open.” He ended the call and hung up. “Looks like you’ll be staying here tonight.”

He watched her eyes widen. “I can’t stay here. It’s not fair to you.”

“Hey, I haven’t been staying here anyway.”

“But this is your room, your bed.”

Smiling, he glanced around at the large space. “I guess we’ll have to share.”

She glared. “You need to get a life, McKane.”

“I have a life, thank you, or at least I did before I moved into the Mountain View Apartments.”

There was another soft knock on the door and Kira peered in. “Is everything okay?” she asked.

“It’s under control now. Mia’s had some contractions. Her doctor wants her to stay in bed and come in tomorrow.”

Mia sat up. "I tried to tell Jarrett that I'll be able to rest better in my own apartment."

Kira stood at the end of the bed. "I know this is difficult, Mia, but you really need to stay put. In the last months when I was pregnant with Jenna, I couldn't even sit up to eat."

"See," Jarrett said. "And she delivered a healthy baby. So you stay."

Suddenly two more people appeared at the door, Nola and Sylvia, looking concerned.

"Please don't worry," Mia said. "I'm fine. But I guess I have to stay put for tonight."

Nola came closer and patted her hand. "We're not worried. Jarrett will take care of you." She looked down at the tray of food. "You need to eat."

Jarrett backed out of the room, leaving the women to pamper Mia. He couldn't help but wonder if he was the cause of her problem.

He rubbed his hand over his face. He had no business near her, let alone kissing her.

What happened to keeping your distance, McKane? The woman is pregnant, for Christ's sake.

He looked up to see Trace coming down the hall. "Is everything okay?"

Hell, would the cavalry be coming next? "Mia had a few contractions, but she's resting now."

"That's good." Trace studied him. "You seem to have inherited a lot more than just an apartment building. Need any help?"

Jarrett wasn't surprised at his brother's offer. For years the kid had tried to get close to him, but Jarrett had always rebuffed him. It made him ashamed of his past actions.

"Thanks, but I'm handling it."

Trace smiled. "I never thought I'd see the day my brother entertained a group of senior citizens in his house and had a pregnant woman in his bed."

Jarrett started to argue, but he had no words.

Trace grinned. "Be careful, bro, you're getting soft, or else, Mia Saunders is doing something no other woman ever has."

Jarrett sighed. "I don't want to hear this." He walked out into the great room, seeing the rest of his guests waiting for some news. He hoped he could convince them everything would be okay. First he had to convince himself.

Darkness surrounded her, but Mia knew she wasn't alone. The small room was filled with loud music, a lot of voices trying to be heard. She could smell cigarette smoke. Someone was smoking.

No! It was bad for the baby. She tried to stand, but someone pulled her back down.

"You can't leave, honey," a man with a slurred voice said. "The party's only getting started. Here have another drink." He put a glass in front of her face and she nearly gagged on the stale smell of beer.

"No! Let me go." She managed to break his hold, and get out the door. The night's cold air caused her to shiver as she looked around, but she couldn't recognize anything. She had no idea where she was, but knew she had to get home. But she had no home.

"Margaret!"

She turned and saw her father. She gasped and tried to run, but her legs were too heavy to move fast and Preston Saunders grabbed her arm.

"You can't get away from me," he threatened.

"Let me go," she cried. "I don't want you."

"I don't want you either, but my grandchild is a different matter. If you think I'll let you raise this baby you'd better think again. It's a Saunders."

"No, it's my baby. It's mine! It's mine!" she cried.

"Mia! Mia! Wake up."

She felt another touch. This time it was different. Gentler. Soothing. She opened her eyes and saw Jarrett leaning over her. With a gasp she went into his arms and held on. Tight.

Jarrett felt her trembling. His arms circled her back and pulled her close and he felt her breasts pressed against his bare chest. The awareness shook him, but he worked to ease her fears.

"Ssh, you were having a bad dream. It's okay, Mia." He felt her tears against his shoulder. "I'm here."

She shivered again and then pulled back but refused to look at him. "I'm sorry."

With the moonlight coming through the French doors, he could see she wasn't all right.

"Bad dream, huh? You want to tell me about it?"

She shook her head, but didn't let go of his hand. "It's just one of those where someone is chasing you."

"Anyone you know?"

She shrugged. "Just someone from a long time ago."

That had him wondering about a lot of things. "A bad-news ex-boyfriend?"

She didn't answer for a long time. He suddenly became aware she was wearing one of his T-shirts, and he was only in a pair of sweatpants, all cozy together on his bed.

"I don't want to talk about it."

He nodded. "Do you want me to get you anything?"

She shook her head. "No, thank you."

"Should I leave?"

She finally looked at him. "Would you mind staying? For a little while?"

He had to hide his surprise. He didn't cuddle with women, not unless it led to something. He was about say, "Not a good idea," but instead he answered, "Not a problem." He changed position, propping himself against the headboard and pulled her back into his arms. "This okay?"

She nodded and then lay back down, her head against her pillow next to him. She blinked up at him with those trusting eyes.

Okay, this wasn't going to work. "Try and get some sleep."

"I don't want to start dreaming again."

He covered her hand with his. "I'm here, Mia. No one will hurt you or your baby as long as I'm around."

Somehow she'd managed to get to him, and he'd just taken on the job of her protector. It was crazy, but he didn't mind one bit.

Mia snuggled deeper into the warmth, enjoying the comfort of the soft bed. She smiled, feeling the strong arms that were wrapped around her back, holding her close.

Slowly, memories of last night began drifting back to her. The nightmare. Her father.

She opened her eyes and was greeted by bright sunlight coming through the French doors. What was more disturbing was the feeling of the bare skin against her cheek. She raised her head to see she was in bed with Jarrett McKane.

Oh, God. What was he still doing here?

She studied the sleeping man who was making soft snoring sounds. He suddenly turned toward her, reaching for her, pulling her against him.

Oh no. His chest was hard and doing incredible things to her out-of-whack libido. But she had a more desperate urge right now. She had to use the bathroom, and quick.

Careful not to disturb him, Mia managed to untangle herself, slide to the side of the bed and escape into the connecting bath.

A few minutes later she returned to find Jarrett awake and leaning against the headboard. His chest was gloriously naked, exposing every defined muscle under his bronzed skin.

“Morning,” he murmured, raking fingers through his hair. “We seem to make a habit of this.”

She had to put a stop to it. “Well, as soon as I get back to my apartment I won’t be bothering you anymore.”

Frowning, he got up and came around to her. “First thing, you need to get back into bed,” he told her, giving her a little nudge to climb in. Once she complied, he continued, “Secondly, I wasn’t complaining, just stating a fact.”

Jarrett hadn’t had much time for female companionship the past few months. Lately it had all been about business, until Mia Saunders and her group of merry followers had appeared in his life. They might be a costly headache, but he’d found he liked the diversion.

He sat on the edge of the bed. His gaze moved over her soft brunette curls and met her pretty blue eyes. Damn, he could get used to this. “Any more dreams?” He could still hear her frightened cries.

She shook her head. “I slept fine. Thank you.”

He smiled and finally coaxed one from her. Damn, she’s pretty, he thought, suddenly realizing his body was noticing, too.

“Okay, I better get breakfast started.” He stood. “Will you eat eggs, or do I need to go on a jelly-donut run?”

Two hours later, Mia sat in the exam room with Doctor Drake, with Jarrett sitting just outside.

After the exam, the doctor pulled off her gloves. “You’re doing fine.”

“What does fine mean?” Mia asked as she sat up.

“You’re effaced fifty percent.”

“Oh, God. Am I going into labor?”

She shook her head. “You aren’t dilated yet. And you haven’t had any more contractions, right?”

“Not since last night.”

There was a knock on the door and a technician came in pushing a machine.

“I want to do an ultrasound as a precaution,” the doctor explained.

“So you are worried?” Mia asked.

“A little concerned. This baby coming early is a very real possibility.” She raised a calming hand. “You’re thirty-six weeks, Mia. All I want to do is check the baby’s weight.”

There was a knock on the door. “Yes?” the doctor called.

Jarrett poked his head in. “Is everything okay?”

The doctor glanced at Mia. “You want him in here?”

Mia looked at Jarrett and found herself nodding. “You can stay if you want,” she told him.

He looked surprised but walked right toward her as she lay back on the table. Although covered with a paper sheet, she realized that she’d be exposing her belly for Jarrett to see.

Dr. Drake nodded toward the opposite side of the exam table for Jarrett to stand, then she began to apply the clear gel on her stomach.

Mia sucked in a breath.

Jarrett took her hand. "You okay?"

She nodded. "The cream is cold."

The doctor went to the machine and made some adjustments, then began to move the probe over her stomach.

Jarrett had no idea what he was doing here. Then he saw Mia's fear, and knew he couldn't leave her. He eyed the machine, watching the grainy picture, and then suddenly it came into focus. He saw a head first, then a small body.

"Well, I'll be damned," he murmured, seeing the incredible image. "That's a baby."

"What did you think it was?" the doctor chided.

Jarrett was embarrassed. "The way she's craved jelly donuts, I wasn't sure."

The doctor laughed. "Since your weight's okay, I'll tell you to indulge, a little. After the baby comes, you'll be on a stricter diet while you're breast-feeding." The doctor glanced at Mia, then back at the screen. "The baby's in position. So that's one less thing to worry about. This is a 3D machine so let's get a better look at this little one." The picture became a lot clearer and a tiny face appeared.

"Oh, my gosh," Mia cried and gripped Jarrett's hand tighter. "It's crazy but he looks like Brad's baby pictures." Tears formed in her eyes and a sob came out. "I'm sorry."

The doctor patted her arm. "It's understandable. Are you ready to know the sex?"

Mia looked at Jarrett. He shrugged, trying to handle his own emotions. "I say it's a boy."

Mia gave a slight nod and the doctor scanned in for a closer look. He saw all the proof he needed. "Well, hello, BJ."

Mia gave him a questioning look.

"I take it you're naming this little guy after your brother," he said. "Bradley Junior."

During the ride home from Grand Junction, Mia had zoned out, not noticing much of the trip until Jarrett stopped in front of the apartment building.

"We're home," he said, but didn't move to get out of the car. "Mia, are you all right?"

No! she wanted to scream. She hadn't been okay since the day her brother had died. She looked at Jarrett, seeing his concern. "Seeing the baby today made it seem so real." Her voice grew softer, more hoarse. "A boy. How can I raise a boy?" Tears filled her eyes, but she couldn't cry any more. "A boy needs a father. Brad should be here."

He reached across the console and took her hand. Even with the heater going, her hands were still cold. "Hey, this kid's got the next best thing. You."

She wasn't the best. "You don't know that. I've done things, made bad choices."

"I can't believe that, or your brother wouldn't have chosen you to carry this baby."

"But not to raise his son." She sighed. "Besides, I've always had Brad to help me, to guide me in life. Now, I'm on my own."

What if I make mistakes again?"

He frowned. "Everyone makes mistakes, Mia, but you can't just give up."

Jarrett had never been the optimistic type, but he was a good salesman. "Don't forget, you have friends to help you. Is there any other family around?"

Mia shook her head. "No. There's no one else." She wiped her eyes. "God, I hate this. I never cry."

"I hear it's normal," he consoled her, hating that he kept getting more and more involved in her life. Not to mention the lives of the other tenants, too.

Once he got off house arrest and they all found other places to live, this time would just be a fleeting memory. They wouldn't be his problem then. They'd move on, and he'd move on. But could he? He thought back to being beside Mia and seeing her baby on the ultrasound.

Damn. He needed to get this apartment building in shape and get the hell out of here. "We'd better get inside and out of the cold so you can rest."

She grumbled. "That's all I've been doing."

"From what Kira tells me you won't get much sleep after the baby comes, so enjoy it now." He started to climb out of the car when she stopped him with a soft touch on his arm.

She nodded in agreement. "Thank you," she said softly. "Thank you for being there with me today."

He caught her pretty blue eyes still glistening with tears and something tightened in his chest. Dear Lord. He was in big trouble.

Chapter Seven

BY the next week, Jarrett had accomplished several things. He'd finally gotten one of the elevators repaired and a plumber had replaced the rusted pipes in the community room. Somehow, he'd even been talked into helping put up some Christmas decorations. Joe convinced him that since this would be Mia's baby's first Christmas, they should celebrate it.

The major thing he'd wanted to do was keep his distance from Mia. He'd gotten too involved with the expectant mother.

Thanks to Nola, Jarrett knew how Mia was doing, whether he wanted to or not. By afternoon, he'd seen several women going into his neighbor's apartment carrying presents for a baby shower.

Kira and Jenna stopped by his place afterward to see him and tell him all about the gifts Mia had gotten for the baby. His niece also had several things to say about the condition of his temporary home. None were good.

"Unca Jay, I like your other house better."

"I still have my other house, sweetie. I'll move back there soon."

She smiled, then looked thoughtful. "But you have to take care of Mia until she has her baby. Promise you will."

What was going on? "Okay, I promise as long as I live here I'll watch out for Mia and the baby."

That seemed to satisfy the three-year-old and she smiled. "Then you can come see her at the ranch. She's going to move in with the new baby." She turned to her mother and was practically jumping up and down. "I can't wait. I get to hold the baby, too."

Jarrett looked at his sister-in-law. "So, it's definite?"

Kira nodded. "I'm pretty sure I have her convinced it's best for her and the child."

"Isn't that neat, Unca Jay, she's gonna be in our family? It's almost going to be our baby, too."

"That's great," he said.

The girl's eyes lit up more. "Maybe if you ask, Mia will share her baby with you, too."

Jarrett looked at Kira for help, hoping she didn't read anything more into his relationship with his neighbor. "Where does she get this stuff?"

Kira only smiled. "Sounds like a pretty good idea to me."

The next day Jarrett drove to his office, McKane Properties, and started two of his staff working on finding affordable apartments for some of the tenants. He needed to get this over and done with.

He needed everyone to move on, but if Mia and the baby moved out to the ranch, he'd still see her. Would that be so bad? With Kira and Trace looking out for her, at least he wouldn't worry about her so much.

That way he could go back to business as usual and a life without Mia in it. He turned his thoughts to the day at the doctor's office and seeing the ultrasound. He'd had no business sharing that with her. Just as he'd had no business kissing her Thanksgiving Day.

He had to stay away.

There were other things he needed to think about, like the Fulton plant project. It had been a big cause of his loss of sleep. He'd been working on some changes, changes to the factory site that might help everyone.

For him to survive financially, Jarrett knew he had to finalize this deal, or he might be living in the Mountain View Apartments permanently.

A few days later Jarrett was awakened in the middle of the night by his ringing phone. He grabbed it off the bedside table.

"Hello," he groaned.

"Jarrett," a familiar voice said. "I'm sorry to bother you, but could you come over?"

"Sure." He hung up, got out of bed, pulled on jeans and shirt along with boots. He crossed the hall, but before he could knock she opened the door.

At 3:00 a.m. in the morning, she looked fresh and dressed for the day. Her dark hair lay in waves around her shoulders and she even had on makeup. "I take it the call wasn't for a donut run?" he joked.

"I need you to take me to the hospital. My water broke."

He froze, then his heart began to race. "You're in labor?"

She nodded. "I've only had some light contractions, but Doctor

Drake said I need to come in now.”

“Of course.” He pointed to his apartment. “Let me grab my car keys.” He rushed back, slipped on a coat and hurried back to find her waiting with a small bag.

“I hated to ask you, but Nola’s daughter is sick and she’s helping with the grandkids,” Mia apologized.

He took her by the arm and they slowly made their way to the elevator. “I’m glad you asked me, I don’t want Nola to drive at night.” He gave her the once-over. “You okay?”

She smiled. “Outside of being a little scared, I feel pretty good.”

“I think it’s normal to feel scared.”

They rode down one floor and the doors opened. “Thank you for helping me out, Jarrett. I know this isn’t in your landlord duties.”

“Hey, I told you it’s not a problem.” They stepped off the elevator and walked outside. “Is there anyone you want me to call?”

Mia shook her head. “Nola was supposed to be my coach, but I can’t take her away from her grandkids.”

“Is there a backup?”

She stopped and looked at him pleadingly. “You?”

“You’re kidding?”

“Do you think I like asking you again?”

“I didn’t say I mind doing it, I just don’t know what to do.” He wasn’t making any sense.

“Join the club. This is my first time, too,” she began, then suddenly groaned.

He saw the pain etched across her face, but it was her fingernails digging into his arm that told him what was happening. Labor had begun.

“Looks like you’re getting an early Christmas present.”

Thirty minutes and five labor pains later, Jarrett pulled up at the emergency-room door. An attendant brought out a wheelchair, and Mia took the seat. Then Jarrett drove off and she was wheeled inside to get admitted.

After minimal paperwork, she was taken up to the maternity floor and into a labor/delivery room. Once dressed in a gown and in bed, she was hooked to monitors to watch her progress.

“Looks like you lose the bet for a Christmas-day baby.”

Mia looked up as Dr. Drake walked in and nodded to the other doctor leaving. “December fifteenth seems like a fine birthday to me.”

“How are you doing?” Lauren asked, checking the monitor.

No sooner were the words out than Mia felt a contraction begin to build.

“Breathe,” the doctor instructed her as she came to the bedside. “It’s almost over. There. Take a cleansing breath.”

Mia sighed and lay back against the pillow. “That was stronger than the others.”

“They’re going to get even stronger before the baby comes. Don’t worry, the anesthesiologist should be here soon with your epidural.” The doctor glanced around. “Do you have someone here with you?”

“Will I do?”

They both turned to find Jarrett standing in the doorway. He hadn’t gone back home.

“Jarrett, you don’t have to stay. This could take all night.”

He came in anyway. “I called Kira and she’s on her way. So how about I be a stand-in until she arrives?”

“Kira’s coming all the way here?”

“I didn’t ask her to, she just said she’s coming to help you.”

Mia had to blink back tears. She wasn’t going to be alone. She managed a nod at Jarrett. “Thank you.”

“I know my limitations. My only experience is birthing calves.” He shook his head. “And that was a long time ago.”

“I’d like to see you all decked out in Western gear, cowboy hat, chaps.” Mia found herself saying, feeling oddly relaxed in between pains.

“Hey, I didn’t look bad.” She knew he was nervous about his role as coach and trying to distract her. “I had a few girls following me around when I did some rodeos. Calf-roping was my event. I was known for my quick hands.”

Mia couldn’t hide her smile. “I bet you were,” she said as another contraction grabbed her. “Ooh...”

The doctor looked at Jarrett. “Do your job, coach,” she told him.

Jarrett took Mia’s hand as Lauren instructed him on what to do.

Over the next hour, Mia's contractions grew more frequent and more intense. It helped if she focused on Jarrett's encouraging words and gentle touch, even his humor. She did her breathing, and he wiped her brow.

After another series of strong contractions had eased, she noticed him watching her. She had to be a mess. Her hair was matted down and she was sweating as though she'd run a mile.

His dark eyes locked on hers. "You're amazing. And you haven't even complained once." He spooned her some ice chips that soothed her throat. "You're going to make a great mother."

"You're not doing so bad yourself. A great stand-in coach." She started to say more when the door opened and the anesthesiologist walked in.

It didn't take the doctor long to work his magic, and soon Mia was relaxed and feeling no discomfort, just pressure from the contractions.

Jarrett stood beside the bed. "Is it better now?"

Smiling, she nodded. "Isn't medication wonderful?"

He laughed. "I'd still have to be knocked out to go through what you're doing."

Over the next hour things began to move a lot faster. Mia's contractions started coming faster and harder, and they were different. She felt more pressure, lower.

Dr. Drake came in and checked the monitor. "Could you step outside a minute, Jarrett?"

He squeezed Mia's hand. "I'll be right back," he promised as he walked out.

The doctor checked her. "You're close, Mia," she told her. "It won't be long now."

"Really?" She glanced at the clock. She'd only been here a few hours.

Lauren smiled. "Sometimes it happens like this, short labor is rare with the first baby."

Mia's thoughts turned to Brad and Karen and sadness swamped her. They should have been here.

Outside the room, a nurse handed Jarrett some paper scrubs. "But I'm not her coach. My sister-in-law is supposed to be here."

The nurse frowned. "Well, if someone plans to be with her, they'd better get inside because she's ready to go."

Jarrett paused momentarily. He didn't want to leave Mia to do this alone. She hadn't complained, but there wasn't anyone else here. He quickly slipped on the scrubs and walked back into the room.

"If you want me to leave, I won't be offended. Just say the word."

Before Mia could speak a contraction seized her and she grabbed his hand. Things happened quickly after that. The doctor instructed him to stand behind Mia. He continued to coax her through each contraction, and held his breath with each push. When she became exhausted, he made her focus.

The next thing Jarrett knew he was witnessing a miracle as Mia's son made his noisy entrance into the world.

"Here's your son, Mia." Doctor Drake held the baby up for inspection.

Jarrett found he was counting fingers and toes and other male body parts. He swallowed hard. "Well, I don't think you're going to have any trouble hearing this guy."

He looked down to see Mia's tears. "He's so beautiful, don't you think?" she asked.

"Well, he runs a close second to Jenna, so yeah, he's a good-looking kid."

A nurse took the baby, carried him to a table and began to clean him up. "He's seven pounds and ten ounces and twenty-one inches long," she announced.

Mia gave him a tired smile. "Jarrett, thank you."

He leaned closer to her. "Hey, you did all the work," he said, brushing back her damp hair. He suddenly felt the urge to kiss her. To signify this special moment.

"Yeah, I did, didn't I?" She looked sleepy. "I hate to ask, but would you call Nola? Let her know that I'm okay?"

Jarrett expected she wanted some privacy. He nodded and left. Outside the room he saw Kira hurrying toward him.

"Sorry I'm late." She studied his face and smiled. "I take it the baby's arrived."

He could only nod, feeling his emotions rushing to the surface. "Yeah, it's a boy. Mia and the baby are fine."

She nodded. "And it looks like you did a good job as a stand-

in.”

He didn’t even bother to deny it. “I couldn’t leave her.”

Kira took his hand. “Be careful, Jarrett. People might mistake you for a good guy,” she teased.

“I don’t think I have to worry about that.” He turned away, wondering when he could see the baby again. “Mia will probably want to see you.” He stripped off his cap. “I need a cup of coffee.” He started to walk away, but stopped. “Tell Mia I’ll be back in a little while.”

His sister-in-law studied him for a long time, then said, “Don’t look now, brother-in-law, your feelings are showing. It’s about time.”

Thirty-six hours later, Mia was nearly ready for the trip back home. She and her baby had been checked out, deemed healthy and could be discharged from the hospital.

There was one thing left. She had to put a name on her son’s birth certificate. During the night, she’d taken out the letter her brother and sister-in-law had left for her, not to be read until after the birth of their baby.

Mia sat up late to read it and let the tears fall—for the parents who would never know their son, and for the baby who wouldn’t have the chance to know them, either.

She opened the envelope.

Dear Mia,

Words can never express the joy and love we feel for you at this moment—the moment we learned that you were pregnant.

Joy and love not only for your unselfish act, not only for giving up a year of your life, but for carrying our child. For that Karen and I will be eternally grateful.

We don't care if this baby is a boy or a girl. But like all mothers, Karen has chosen names for the child. Bradley Preston for a boy or Sarah Margaret for a girl.

Our son or daughter will know what a special person you are. To make sure of that, you will always be a big part of his or her life. Karen and I would like you to be the godmother to little Brad Jr. or Sarah.

If, God forbid, anything should ever happen to either of us, we want you to be the child's guardian. After all, you carried this little miracle in your womb and in your heart for nine months. So who better? Our only other wish is that you find the happiness you truly deserve.

Love always, Brad and Karen.

Mia had sobbed most of the night after that, then the baby was brought to her to be fed. The second she held him in her arms, she knew that she loved him. Yes, BJ was her heart. And he was her son now.

Two hours later, Jarrett parked outside the apartment building and Mia glanced back at the baby. She still had trouble thinking of herself as a mother.

It didn't take long for a welcoming party to open the door and wave. "Looks like everyone is anxious to see the new resident," Jarrett announced.

That made Mia smile. “BJ’s going to have many surrogate grandparents, that’s for sure.”

“Let’s get him inside before they start the inspection,” Jarrett said.

He climbed out and came around to the passenger side. He opened the back door and unfastened the baby carrier from its base. “Come on, fella. You’ve got people to meet.”

He raised the carrier’s hood and used a blanket to protect the baby from the cold, then lifted him out of the car.

Mia was waiting and took his offered arm as they made their way up the shoveled walk to the door and went in.

“Welcome home, Mia,” Nola called along with several other tenants as they walked inside.

“Thank you. It’s good to be back.”

She glanced around the large entry to see it had been decorated for the holidays. A large tree sat in the center of the area and lights and garlands had been strung along the wrought-iron stairway.

She went to one of the grouping of sofas and Jarrett placed the baby down on one of the now slip-covered sofas. Mia pulled back the blanket and everyone gasped.

“Oh, he’s perfect,” Nola cooed and glanced at Mia. “And so handsome, like your brother. What’s his name?”

Mia swallowed. “Bradley Preston Saunders, Junior. That’s the name Brad and Karen chose. I’m going to call him BJ.”

Nola smiled. “It’s perfect.”

She felt Jarrett's presence behind her. It seemed so natural for him to be there. Too natural.

"I think these two need some rest," Jarrett told everyone.

Normally, Mia wouldn't like him making decisions for her, but she was tired. "Maybe you can come up later."

"Of course, but you need to rest now," Nola added. "If you need someone to watch this little guy, I'm available."

Jarrett picked up the carrier and placed a hand on her elbow as they made their way to the elevator. She was glad she didn't have to climb the stairs. They stepped into the small paneled compartment. He punched the second floor button and the doors closed.

Конец ознакомительного фрагмента.

Текст предоставлен ООО «ЛитРес».

Прочитайте эту книгу целиком, купив полную легальную версию на ЛитРес.

Безопасно оплатить книгу можно банковской картой Visa, MasterCard, Maestro, со счета мобильного телефона, с платежного терминала, в салоне МТС или Связной, через PayPal, WebMoney, Яндекс.Деньги, QIWI Кошелек, бонусными картами или другим удобным Вам способом.